Traps and Thrills on an Iowa Trail

CHAPTER V

ADVENTURE WITH A COON.

THE animals were soon skinned, and, as they were fat, we decided to render some oil. "Dago," our leader—for we had accorded him that place of honor—stated that we could easily sell several dollars' worth, judging from the price asked at his uncle's store. We were highly pleased at this information and all of us had visions of getting rich quick. If we could make twenty or thirty dollars a day from pelts and five or ten from oil, certainly nothing better could be desired. And with that we began to lay our plans for even greater efforts so far as skunks were concerned. All of us had forgotten about the instructions we had recently received at home. Right then, we saw—and talked of—nothing but money and our work.

The afternoon passed quickly. Already the sun had sunk in the west. By the time we walked to town, darkness had fallen. Our catch was taken to an old icehouse, long abandoned, which stood on the McKerron property, and placed on boards. Jim's father helped by making the stretchers with a draw-knife, thereby saving us much labor.

Gradually, winter came. The winds swept over the prairies and chilled the very marrow in the bones. Lower went the thermometer. Already ice covered the creek and muskrat trapping got very poor. For a while we kept the slides open by placing coarse salt in sacks under the sets but even this failed during the cold weather. There was nothing to do then but pull up our Victors. This we reluctantly did and placed them for mink. As St. John said, little could be caught in such weather except mink. The pelts had primed up and he expected good prices. Accordingly, we confined our attempts to springs and flowing tiles, places the animals visited despite the blustery winter.

To a degree we were successful. Fred, who gave particular attention to these fur bearers, made practically all the sets. In some way, he knew just where and how to place the traps to get results. Soon a number of fine skins were added to our lot. But constant trapping makes even the less cunning animals shy, and toward the first of the year we were hardly making enough to pay us for running our line. Of course we shortened it as much as possible, and instead of having ten or twelve miles to cover, were content with three or four. And with the thick ice, most of the territory could be reached on skates.

Then something happened. Jim had received a light for Christmas and delighted to use it in looking into dark places where fur bearers might travel. On one of our trips he discovered tracks in the mud where it was shallow, under the ice.

"Look," he shouted, excitedly. "A regular trail and——"

We pushed him away. Sure enough, a spot was discovered where traps might be placed to advantage. Accordingly, we lost no time in arranging our sets and covering up the hole so the light would not penetrate. Next morning we had a large brown mink.

With that, our enthusiasm mounted. We would get more fur. Naturally, the next day—our school had let out for a week's vacation—we went along Rock Creek and cut holes in the ice where we thought there were chances of making a catch. By this method we were able to put out several traps.

Where flowing tiles emptied into the stream, furnished, however, the best locations for our traps. Experience taught us that with the use of bait—muskrat flesh was ideal—we could get a number of mink which otherwise might pass by. Hence, we depended mostly on such sets.

Skunk trapping was not to be thought of at this time. With snow two feet deep, the animals had denned up and did not run. Only once in a while did we discover a track. I was for digging the animals out but after trying the frozen ground with pick and spade, gave up the attempt.

Next morning we caught but one fur bearer, a small mink. Jim stunned it with a club and then drowned it—or thought he did. When life seemed to be extinct, he put the carcass in his coat pocket and started for home. On reaching it, he threw his clothes into a corner of the room and changed to others. Later, after he went to get the animal, we found it gone.

"That's funny," Fred said. "We must have lost it on the way in. I'll go back and——"

Something stirred in the corner.

"What's that?" I asked, pointing.

Mr. McKerron grabbed a shoe-last and made for the animal, which we supposed until that time was an ordinary rat. Through the shoe shop raced the missing fur bearer. Four of us pursued. Finally, Jimmy hit it with a mop and gathered in the prize. This time we made sure it was dead. "Gee!" I suggested, after the excitement was all over, "just suppose you had put your hand into the pocket and it would have bitten you?"

"I didn't," was the answer. "And what is more, I'm going to take no chances in the future." We had learned a lesson,—respect for the sharp teeth and powerful jaws of the cunning animal.

One by one the traps were gathered in. After we had finished with them, we washed the outfit in strong lye water and hung it in a dry place. We knew the traps would be in good condition for the next season.

With little prospects for furs, we did not spend much time on the line except to look at some sets for mink which promised good returns. On one of these trips, early in the morning, we discovered a raccoon high up in a cottonwood which, like a lonely sentinel, stood guard on the banks of Rock Creek. It was the only tree of its size and kind within miles of Stanwood.

This fur bearer, by the way, was scarce in that locality. I had my twenty-two rifle along, so felt reasonably sure that we should add another skin to our collection. So, quietly, I began to approach the ring-tail in the hopes of getting a good shot. The animal, however, seemed aware of my intention and slowly started toward a hollow in the trunk. Once we let him get there and we knew the chances of getting him were slim. With the small caliber I had, even a fair shot was not certain to kill.

AS HE REACHED FOR THE COON, SIGNS OF LIFE BECAME APPARENT.

"Shoot," my companions shouted, excitedly.

Fully sixty yards were between me and the game. To make matters worse, small twigs were in the way. However, I took quick aim and at the crack the 'coon seemed untouched. Just as I was about to load once more, the fur bearer fell and lodged about ten feet lower in a crotch.

"Whoopee!" shouted Jim.

"I knew you'd do it," cried Fred.

But since the carcass was nearly forty feet in the air, the only way to get it was to climb the tree. Fred, pulling off his shoes, volunteered.

We gave our partner all the aid we could. The trunk was fully four feet in circumference and hard to grip. Twice were trials made that ended in failure. "Get a board," Fred pleaded, gaining his breath. "And hurry, for my feet are getting cold and wet."

Jim and I did our best. A quarter of a mile away in a fence corner we found exactly what we wanted. Dragging it back, we put the rail against the cottonwood. The trapper gained the first crotch. As he reached for the 'coon, signs of life became apparent. The raccoon was far from dead, ripping the trapper's hand open with its claws and nearly causing him to lose his hold. How he escaped falling, no one ever knew.

The animal was bleeding but regaining strength fast. Fred had backed away in the direction of the hole in the trunk. Unsuccessfully, he searched for a limb he could break off and use for protection. In the meantime, the animal continued to come slowly toward him.

As is usually the case in such emergencies, the empty shell stuck in the chamber. Frantically, with a knife, I worked to get it out. At last the little bit of copper was pried loose and another shot inserted. With Fred in danger, I took a chance and fired a second time at the game within a few feet of him. Never once did I think that my aim might not be true and the bullet, glancing from the cottonwood, strike my companion. But luck was with me, and as the smoke curled from the barrel the 'coon crumpled up and came crashing to the ground. It was dead when we reached it and one of the finest fur bearers I had ever seen in that part of the state.

Fred slowly climbed down. "I was scared stiff," he said, "when the thing bit me," exhibiting his bloody hand, "and worse when it came in my direction. But when you shot! Say, that muzzle seemed to be pointed right at my head and I couldn't even holler. As the gun cracked I shut my eyes and the next thing I knew the 'coon was on the ground. Not until then did I realize the risk I had taken."

With Jim carrying the game, we hastened to Stanwood. There at the shoe store we exhibited our prize. Even the old hunters announced that the carcass was as large as any they had ever seen, and, in that place of swapping stories, we were satisfied indeed.

Questions Answered

MRS. A. W., GA.—There are various tanning preparations offered by mail-order concerns. The beginner, however, generally spoils too much fur before he learns just how to cure his skins. Prices of pelts are too high nowadays to risk them with home preparations. Let some good tanner do the work. The expense is small and in this way one can obtain furs which make up well into garments. Will give you recipe for preparing fox and other small skins if you insist but think you make a mistake if you attempt tanning at home. Should the pelts be desired to ship to some fur firm, do not tan at all. Simply stretch and dry in a cool place where there is plenty of air.

C. B., WIS.—The reader who inquires whether it would pay to trap in the southeastern part of Wisconsin should be assured that the state as a whole is the best in the country for animals, number and quality considered. Big money will be made by pelt hunters in practically every rural community.

E. W., TEXAS.—The reason skunk are so high and civets so low is because of Fashion principally and the fact that the market for civets is Russia where most of the skins—practically all—were sold. Russia has not been an active fur market for years and the accumulation of stocks by dealers are so large that they do not wish to sink more money than is necessary in the pelts. (2) Fur farming is profitable. However, where animals are "cooped up" they do not fur up as well as when wild and therefore do not, as a rule, bring the best prices. An experienced grader is able, as a rule, to pick out "tame skunk" in a dark room where there are hundreds of skins. Fur farming is profitable from the standpoint of marketing pelts only when conditions are such that the animals can be raised the same, or nearly the same, as when wild. (3) Northern Texas, considering quality in fur, would not be so good as Iowa, Nebraska or other states farther north. (4) Skunk farming would surely be more profitable in Texas than fox farming. It is doubtful if the black, silver, cross, etc., could be raised successfully in Texas at all. They inhabit the colder latitudes. (5) There is no telling whether furs will remain as high as now for eight or ten years. The best one can do—even with the well informed—is to guess. (6) Silver fox are found in the U. S. It is not unusual to take both this and black in Wisconsin, Maine, Michigan and nearby territory. The animals are most numerous in Canada and Alaska.

B. B., Ohio.—Ground hog skins have no value with fur firms and cannot be sold to any concern, so far as the writer knows.

D. B., Miss.—It is a hard matter to say whether birds or flesh—and by flesh I presume you mean beef, muskrat carcasses, etc.—are best for opossum. Both give good results at places and times when properly employed. A study of attractors reveals the fact that the fur bearers are much like people; what one species likes at a particular place or time may be unsuited at another. Constant experiments are necessary to draw the fur bearers to best advantage. The paste lures offered by the various fur firms and concerns are excellent also. No one can positively state exactly what is best for opossum or any other animal, strictly speaking, so far as decoys are concerned. Other good baits are smoked and fresh fish, salmon canned or sardines put up in oil.

C. A., Nebraska.—It is reasonable to suppose that muskrats if not caught or molested will continue to use a burrow for a number of years. Constant changes, no doubt, will be made from time to time to accommodate conditions.

MRS. H. W., West Virginia.—Any furrier or custom tanner should be able to do the work. The cost will be from eight to fifteen dollars. Kinds of lining, style in making up and other things enter into the matter. The very latest style, head mounting, etc., including tanning of skin, etc., costs $13.50 or about this much. You should obtain a style catalog from the one who is to do the work so as to select the kind of neckpiece wanted.

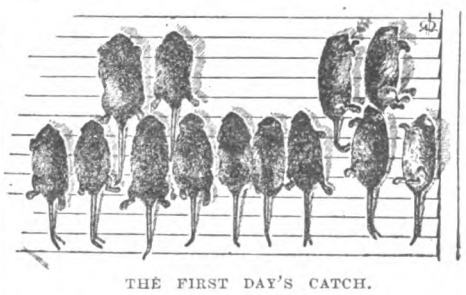
Letters and Photographs from COMFORT Trappers

Nevada Trappers

We began trapping last season about November 10, and trapped until March 20, 1919. Our catch consisted of 18 coyotes, 35 lynx cats, 8 badgers and 4 civet cats. We used about 30 No. 3 traps and used jack rabbit for bait. All the furs we got were salable. The coyotes averaged about $11.00 apiece, the lynx cats about $8.00 apiece, the badgers 70 cents and the civit cats 40 cents each. The largest lynx cat we caught measured, when stretched and dry, 51 inches from the end of its nose to the end of its tail. It was the largest lynx cat that had ever been caught around here. The fur was a beauty. Coyotes began to get prime in this section about October 20, lynx cats not much before January 1. Badgers are not prime until about the first of January but they stay prime longer than any other fur in the spring, sometimes up to May.

In trapping lynx cats, it is always best to make the set on the south end or side of cliffs or rocks. The best bait is rabbit. Fasten the bait securely to a bush, rock or tree. Then make a corral around the rabbit about 3 feet by 3 feet and about 3 or 4 feet high, of brush or limbs. Leave an opening 12 or 14 inches wide. Procure a large stone, flat on one side. Lay the stone just a little out from the opening and set the trap just inside the corral next to the stone and a little lower. Cover with underbrush or broken up cedar bark. The idea of the stone is to keep the animal from scratching and uncovering the trap. Always fasten the trap to a stick about 5 feet long and about 4 inches in thickness. Fasten the chain in the middle of the stick. By doing this way, the animal will never break the chain and get away with the trap.

We are yours very truly,
CROFUT BROTHERS, Nevada.



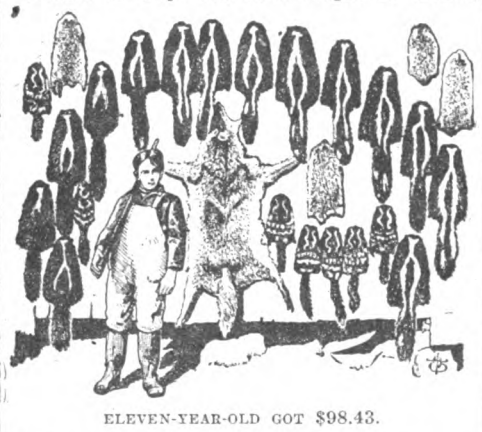
PART OF THE CATCH OF TWO NEVADA TRAPPERS.

Earns Money Trapping for College Education

I entered the trapping season last fall with the determination of making enough money, to go to college on this summer, out of school hours. I have succeeded fairly well. I started out with about 30 traps, and trapped mostly for skunk and muskrat.

Altogether I have caught 204 muskrat, 19 skunk, 5 opossum and several weasel. I find that trapping muskrat is the most profitable, as they are easily caught and easily handled.

THE FIRST DAY'S CATCH.



My favorite method of catching muskrat is setting traps at their runways. I never set at the den as it causes them to become wary after one has been caught.

I am sending a photograph of my first ten days' catch.

E. DALE KNIGHT, Indiana.

Good Work for Boy

I have 42 traps and have caught 17 skunks,

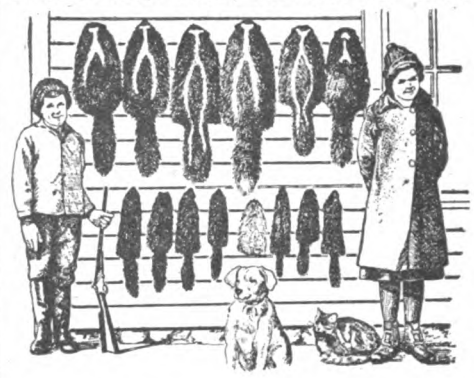
ELEVEN-YEAR-OLD GOT $98.43.

18 civet cats, 10 opossum, 3 mink and one large coyote.

They were all salable. The lot brought me $98.43. Don't you think that is pretty good for a little 11-year-old boy?

ANDY BLAND, Kansas.

Coons His Specialty



I used 50 traps last season and caught 44 skunks and nine raccoons. I sold five skunks and I got $22.00 for them. I sold 38 skunks and got $115.00. Here is my story, how I caught my raccoons:

Before I catch raccoons I go and find their trail. When I find it I put a bait about two feet above the path. I put the trap under the bait and I go away from it. I never set a trap with my bare hands as the raccoons can smell it. The best place I find the raccoon is down along the river. I also caught some raccoon alive. I have one for a pet and he is very cute. When I put candy in my pockets he goes in after it no matter how deep my pockets are. I still have six live raccoons.

LAWRENCE KEPPLER, Minnesota.

Boy and Girl Make Good Catch

I caught last season 6 narrow stripe skunks, one short stripe skunk, one mink, one weasel, one muskrat and seven civet cats. I received $28.40 for them.

Most of the furs I caught have been trapped at their holes. A good way to keep the traps from being frozen to the ground is to put a piece of rabbit fur or a piece of cotton under the trap. Another way to trap skunk is to build a three-cornered pen with a narrow entrance at one side. Set a trap at the entrance. Tainted meat is best for bait. The bait should be placed inside the pen. The pen should be covered to keep the crows from getting the bait.

LYNN MIGHELL, Iowa.

$322.75 Not Bad for Good Trappers

To begin with, I advertised through one of our local papers here last October for a partner who had had experience. Well, I got a good pard, one who knew every angle and trick in the business and who was a perfect woodsman. His name was L. W. Well, Lem came to me with two hundred traps and a full equipment for the trapping line, and I having over two hundred myself.

The first night Lem's set went big. He had four skunk, five opossum and eleven rats, and down my way luck wasn't so good, but it was my own fault, in a way, as I overslept myself and didn't get to my line until six forty A. M., and the results were: In my first three traps I had three front feet only, but along the whole line (50 traps) I had seven rats and one big coon. Each afternoon Lem and I met at my house and as I had a motorcycle we took our catch and skinned them together and worked together. We only put out 50 traps apiece to feel out the fur situation. After that we put out 150 each and we had good catches.

The most things to trap were rats and a few opossum and squirrels, but during February things got slow, so we sold what we had and Lem went back home. We had just 225 rats, 2 coons, 9 skunk and 14 opossum.

We sold our furs and got in return $322.75; $280.50 for rats, $20.25 for skunk, $8.00 for coons, and $14.00 for opossum.

JAMES WILSON, New Jersey.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

VIVIAN, Williston, N. D.—Suspenders are a most respectable article of dress, and we do not think the habit of wearing them should disqualify this young man who is paying you attention—and particularly when he is otherwise of the sort that everyone thinks you are "lucky to have." It is only of late years that belts have taken such a prominent part in manly attire and have so largely replaced the humble but more comfortable "gallus." It is very certain that Abraham Lincoln wore suspenders, such as you despise, to hold up the presidential trousers, and that he did not write the Emancipation Proclamation, nor make his famous Gettysburg Address, with an uncomfortable half-inch leather strap buckled tightly about his waist. However, if you think this young man is too neglectful of his dress, why not drop a gentle hint or two? You should be able to do this safely and pleasantly. But take our word for it that a kind and honest heart is worth more than the illusive pleasure given by any glass of fashion or mould of form. (2) Your spelling is correct and your handwriting good.

PUG NOSE, Belton, S. C.—There is probably nothing in your own conduct to cause these various boys to come and go in their attentions to you. It is simply that they are young and fickle—just as you are doubtless fickle and young. And you should know very well that at seventeen you should not be wishing any steady "sweetheart." There will be time enough for you to find some admirer more stable during the next year or two. (2) You may say a simple "Thank you" to anyone who offers to hitch your horse for you when you are at church or elsewhere.

R. H., Walnut Ridge, Ark.—Most certainly you may wear your wedding ring without an engagement circlet ater your marriage. Although it is not required, the initials of the bride and groom and the date of the ceremony may be engraved inside of the wedding ring. But we think this rather an unnecessary trouble and expense.

DOLLY DIMPLES, Wyo.—You may do as you like regarding offering your hand when a young man is introduced to you. We think it is more pleasant and cordial to shake hands, although etiquette does not require that this be done.

K. B., Mt. Olivet, Ky.—It would be very foolish to give up your friendship with a boy because other boys do not like him for no other reason than that he is too good looking. If you like him, you should have mind enough of your own to stand by him. (2) If any young man is so foolish as not to know that you are too young to marry at sixteen—why we think that it would be safe to enlighten him by telling him this.

E. B., Muncy, Penn.—There are no set phrases for occasions of the sort you mention. You may respond, "I am very glad to have met you," or you may only give a bow, a smile and a handshake.

HOPPY, Swifton, Ark.—Your difficult complexion will probably clear itself as you grow older. You can help by avoiding sweets and pastry; by drinking plenty of water, and by bathing often. Every night before retiring, wash your face carefully with warm water and some mild pure soap and dry gently with a soft towel. (2) Wear your hair back from your forehead in simple schoolgirl fashion.

SWEET SIXTEEN, Bonnerdale, Ark.—We have no hesitation in saying that in these days of high prices, a boy with a "lot of money" would be more desirable as a husband than one without—other qualities being about equal. However, we are sure that any boy with this "lot of money" would want a wife with a lot more spelling book experience than you seem to have, and we advise you to take a little time from all of these boys that are flocking to see you and spend this time on your lessons.

E. R., Cal.—In the introduction the lady's name should come first; for instance, "Miss Blank, I want to present Mr. Dash." In the case where a young lady is brought for introduction to a couple who are standing together, the introduction between the two ladies is first made and the gentleman is then presented in his turn. (2) In leaving a restaurant or ice-cream parlor it would be correct for a young lady to proceed slowly toward the door while her escort was settling with the cashier, or she may, if she wishes, remain by the man while the bill is being paid.

HONEST MAID, Clay City, Ky.—When on the street, a gentleman is always supposed to walk on the side of the lady which is nearest the curb; the idea being that he can thus protect her from street traffic, mud, etc. Indoors, at receptions and other affairs, a gentleman places himself where he can, if need arise, offer his left arm. (2) If you know a "charming boy" you wish to have like you, we can only advise you to be as much of a "charming girl" as possible.

SWEETIE, Holly Springs, Miss.—If this man told your cousin that he "was thinking of marrying you," this is probably as near as you can get to any information on the subject from one you say is so habitually "close-mouthed." You will have to take into consideration his reputation as a flirt. You do not draw a very encouraging picture of him as a future husband, and we are sure that a man who is a flirt [illegible] us and bad tempered is hardly good material from which to build a happy married life. Perhaps your parents are justified in their dislike of him. Do not let him think that he can make you do all that he wishes or that you care too much for him, and possibly this treatment may have a good effect upon his disposition. But red-haired men are apt to be cantankerous creatures and we advise you to go slow.

I. H., Irvingsville, Ky.—You may receive proper attentions from boys if your parents do not object and it does not interfere with the completion of your education. Your handwriting is correct and legible.

BROWN EYES, Waverly, O.—Our advice is exactly that of your mother who is dead, and we are glad to know that you are sensible enough to realize that she was right. Suppose you simply pass on to these young men what her instructions were to you.

M. L. R., Grand Rapids, Mich.—It would be the girl's place to mention when she wished to return. (2) See answer to E. B., Muncy, Penn., in this column.

E. P., Dunsmith, N. D.—A man should be several years older than the woman he marries. Twelve years, in the case you mention, would not constitute too great a difference in age.

IS YOUR BLOOD HUNGRY FOR IRON?

Modern Methods of Cooking and Living Have Made An Alarming Increase in Iron Deficiency in Blood of American Men and Women

NUXATED IRON Helps Make Red Blood

The Kind That Puts Roses Into the Cheeks of Women and Force Strength and Courage Into Veins of Men.

"Is your blood starving for want of iron? Iron is red blood food. If you were to go without eating until you became weak, thin and emaciated, you could not do a more serious harm to yourself than when you let your blood literally go hungry for want of iron—iron that gives it strength and power to change food into living tissue," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital.

"Modern methods of cooking and the rapid pace at which people of this country live has made such an alarming increase in iron deficiency in the blood of American men and women that I have often marveled at the large number of people who lack iron in the blood—and who never suspect the cause of their weak, nervous, run-down state. But in my opinion, you can't make strong, sturdy men and women by feeding them on metallic iron. The old forms of metallic iron must go through a digestive process to transform them into organic iron—Nuxated Iron—before they are to be taken up and assimilated by the human system. Notwithstanding all that has been said and written on this subject by well-known physicians, thousands of people still insist in dosing themselves with metallic iron simply, I suppose, because it costs a few cents less. I strongly advise readers in all cases to get a physician's prescription for organic iron—Nuxated Iron—or if you don't want to go to this trouble, then purchase only Nuxated Iron in its original packages and see that this particular name (Nuxated Iron) appears on the packages. If you have taken preparations such as Nux and Iron and other similar iron products and failed to get results, remember that such products are an entirely different thing from Nuxated Iron."

If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of ordinary Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see how much you have gained. Numbers of nervous, run-down people who were ailing all the while have increased their strength and endurance in two weeks' time while taking iron in the proper form.

just come to light in this city, and is exciting the interest and curiosity of people who have known the parties intimately connected with it. Many years ago Jonas Huntington, a brother of the late Eben Huntington, formerly a wealthy pork-packer of Cincinnati, went to India, presumably to seek his fortune. A few years later it was reported that he was dead, and, as time went on and nothing more was heard either from or of him, the report was credited by his relatives. A few months ago, a prominent lawyer of this place received a package of legal papers from a brother lawyer of London, England, and upon examining them, was astonished to learn that Jonas Huntington did not die in India, as reported, but lived to carry on a prosperous business as a dealer in ivory, for many years. Last year, about this time, he arrived in London, with all his fortune. He was on his way home, to visit his relatives, and to choose his heir, as he had no family of his own. But he was suddenly taken ill just when he expected to sail, and was told that he had not long to live, whereupon he at once made his will, naming Miss Violet Huntington, the younger daughter of his brother, Eben, as his heir, and directing that an old friend, Ralph Middleton, if he were still living, and practicing law, should be the administrator of his estate, which is said to consist chiefly in bonds and legitimate stock to a very large amount.

"Now comes the perplexing and romantic part of the story. Miss Violet Huntington is dead, having been accidentally drowned at Mentone, more than a year ago, and just on the eve of her marriage with an English earl. Her only living relative is Mrs. Wilhelm Mencke, recently a resident of Cincinnati; but the Menckes, who were so unfortunate as to lose all their property soon after the death of Miss Huntington, have disappeared, no one can tell whither, and cannot be found, although they have long been advertised for; consequently there is no one to claim this large fortune left by Jonas Huntington, and the estimable lawyer who has it in charge is considerably puzzled to know what to do with it."

The Quick Way to Stop a Cough

This home-made syrup does the work in a hurry. Easily prepared, and saves about $2.

You might be surprised to know that the best thing you can use for a severe cough, is a remedy which is easily prepared at home in just a few moments. It's cheap, but for prompt results it beats anything else you ever tried. Usually stops the ordinary cough or chest cold in 24 hours. Tastes pleasant, too—children like it—and it is pure and good.

Pour 2½ ounces of Pinex in a pint bottle; then fill it up with plain granulated sugar syrup. Or use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup, if desired. Thus you make a full pint—a family supply—but costing no more than a small bottle of ready-made cough syrup.

And as a cough medicine, there is really nothing better to be had at any price. It goes right to the spot and gives quick, lasting relief. It promptly heals the inflamed membranes that line the throat and air passages, stops the annoying throat tickle, loosens the phlegm, and soon your cough stops entirely. Splendid for bronchitis, croup, hoarseness and bronchial asthma.

Pinex is a highly concentrated compound of Norway pine extract, famous for its healing effect on the membranes.

To avoid disappointment ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with directions and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

L. B. L., Sweetwater, Tenn.—Yours is but one of the many inquiries this department receives from COMFORT readers who would like to get into the "movies." For your benefit and that of others, we state that the matter of becoming even a very minor artist of the screen presupposes some dramatic experience and ability. It is a requisite that the applicant have a face which will photograph or "register" well, and which may conform to some certain type. There are people who have faces which from some trick of feature or expression are totally unfit for screen use, and such persons could not be of value in any moving picture studio even though they had great dramatic ability. In fact it generally requires a test before the camera to find out if any particular person is of a type which registers effectively in the celluloid drama or comedy. The eyes, their color, size and expression, are of much importance. You would gain nothing—probably not even a reply—by writing to the great moving picture directors and managers. The only thing to do, if you are serious in your "movie" ambition, would be to apply in person to some of the big studios in either New York City or California and see if you could obtain employment in a supernumerary capacity. Hundreds of "extras" or "supes" are employed in big productions where crowds, mobs, soldiers, etc., are required to appear in large masses. Employment in this way, which is not always difficult to secure and not badly paid, would give you a chance to see if you are fitted for the work, and the acquaintance which you would gain with conditions and opportunities in the profession would enable you to mount higher if you really have the ability and the required screen qualities.

E. C. B., South Haven, Mich.—Send your inquiry to the Hon. J. A. Calder, Minister of Immigration and Colonization, Ottawa, Canada, for full information as to homestead lands and laws in Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, Canada.

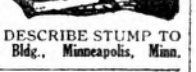
MRS. W. M. C., South Haven, Mich.—See above answer to E. C. B., South Haven, Mich.

MRS. J. D., Lafferty, O.—If this girl's father is an American citizen, there would be no difficulty concerning her return to this country from Europe where she now is. It would be well to supply her with a copy of her birth certificate to bring with her. This would avoid any delay with the immigration authorities.

L. P., Iola, Kans.—There is no "government patent attorney." There is, however, a U. S. Patent Office, which can be addressed at Washington, D. C., and from where you may obtain information concerning securing a patent.

M. M. J., New York.—Most certainly if any composer furnished music for a song poem he would expect to be paid for his work. The price paid such composer would depend upon the length of the song and the reputation of the musician. Ordinarily it would range from ten to a hundred dollars. Also royalty arrangements are often demanded and made. Any song poem should be typewritten and submitted directly by the author to the publisher. Should any publisher purchase verses from you that were afterward made into a song, your name would appear upon the title page of the composition, together with that of the composer. If you arranged to sell the poem outright, it is doubtful if the publisher would agree to any royalty as extra compensation, although this is done in the case of well-known authors of particularly desirable compositions. This department could not furnish you with the name of any individual composer who might care to collaborate with you. You might get in touch with such persons by placing an advertisement in the columns of one of the periodicals which are read by musicians.

F. A. O., Evansville, Ind.—We are unfamiliar with the tax laws of your particular state, but in the majority of states and cities bank deposits are classed as personal property and may be so taxed. If your question concerning taxation on municipal and corporation bonds refers to the new conditions established by the Federal Income Tax law, we answer that you will find all rulings and exemptions stated on the blank forms which you can obtain from the Internal Revenue Collector for your district. They are too long and complex for us to list them here.



T. L., Glen Allen, Ala.—We have no knowledge of any institution founded to educate tuberculous persons, although many states and municipalities maintain free sanitoriums for the care of those afflicted with tuberculosis. We advise you to make inquiry of your local physician or that you write to the Department of Charities of your state.

F. P., Beuld, Ill.—Cowboys are a dwindling race in the West, and this being so, you can imagine that there is but little demand for "cowgirls" as an occupation to be followed by your sex. We feel quite sure that your state of Illinois can offer you no opportunities as a corraler of cows, although we are sure that there are plenty of girls driving automobiles and farm tractors about the roads of your justly famous agricultural state. Why not restrict your ambition to that of becoming a "chauffeurette?"

MRS. B. E. M., Yarmouth, Me.—You should be able to obtain some particulars regarding the death of your brother from the one who was in command of his company at the time of his death. If you do not know this, you will perhaps get some result by starting an inquiry through the Adjutant General's Office, Washington, D. C. State your brother's company, regiment and division exactly as you gave them to this department. Also the date of his death and the date you received notification. Ask to be informed, if possible, of the name and address of your brother's company commander.

R. R. S., Green Forest, Ark.—Pumpkins may be successfully canned by cutting into small pieces, removing the rind and boiling until soft enough to put through a rather fine colander. Let as much liquid as possible drain off the pumpkin, then reheat until scalding hot, using care not to burn. Place in carefully sterilized glass cans and keep in a dark, cool cellar. Add no salt spice nor sugar to the pumpkin. These may be added when cans are opened for use. (2) We cannot tell you where you can obtain the words of "My Mother's Prayer," a poem by W. S. Wheeden. THERE is someone in every family who is constipated, bilious, dyspeptic. They need my Syrup Pepsin and will be better off for using it. It may be a woman, an old man, a tiny baby. Syrup Pepsin is as effective for grownups as it is safe for babies. Thousands of mothers can testify to that.

Perhaps you have reached the stage where you take pills every night and think there is nothing else for you to do. Don't believe it! No matter how chronically constipated or dyspeptic you are, Syrup Pepsin will regulate you. It is a combination of simple laxative herbs with pepsin that acts on the stomach and intestines, and in a short time trains the digestive organs to do their work naturally and without help.

YES. I TAKE MY OWN MEDICINE!

I know what old people suffer with their bowels for I have been a family physician in my county since 1875, and I am old myself, past 80 years of age; born 1839, and still strong. I don't know of a remedy that is better for old people than my Syrup Pepsin, and I'll tell you why: It is mild and gentle in action; it doesn't gripe, and it doesn't lose its effect when you take it regularly. I know this by using it myself, by prescribing it since 1875 and by manufacturing it since 1892. You can form your own opinion by sending for a free trial bottle.

WHO NEEDS SYRUP PEPSIN

I want to send a free trial bottle of my Syrup Pepsin to anyone who suffers from one or more of the following: Constipation, indigestion, dyspepsia, biliousness, headache, belching, bad taste, bad breath, dizziness, drowsiness, and the many other symptoms of sluggish bowels. The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS E. L. G., Olpe, Kansas.—Dryness of the feet and hands, in the main, is due to some lack of innervation of the parts. The salve and glycerine that you have been employing is injurious and contraindicated in every way. Use instead a cold spray to the spine, wear stockings with a silk bottom, massage the feet and take five drops of nux vomica tincture after meals.

MRS. A. J., Gannett, Idaho.—A cold douche to the spine, with the feet in hot water at the time of douche, will do much to relieve the numbness of the leg. Add to this massage of the back and leg.

MRS. W. G. B., Cold Springs, N. C.—Have a bunion-shoe made to order. The arch support will do no good. Apply at night to the bunion an ointment of ichthyol, twenty per cent in strength.

MRS. M. M. J., N. Y.—Your gain in weight, no doubt, is due to proper food and not to the medicine mentioned. As to question about cancer, the answer is—no. Fibroid tumors may return in another part after removal, but this is not the rule—they are benign growths. Indigestion can be cured after the cause is ascertained. Try American oil, in teaspoonful doses, with your meals, and see that your bowels are free and regular.

MISS B. I. S., Rockford, N. C.—Go to any large city, as New York, and you can be treated successfully for the removal of hairs. Done with care, and skillfully, there is no irritation or scar left after removal.

MRS. J. H., Binghampton, N. Y.—For your husband's persistent cough, have him stop smoking at once, and have him spray and gargle the throat with Dobell's solution.

MRS. A. G. P., Tappan, N. Y.—Try one teaspoonful of Jamaica dogwood, in water, after meals, for the painful menstration. For the dandruff, use a two per cent solution of resorcin, in water, to which a small amount of grain alcohol has been added.

MRS. W. S., Ruddle, West Va.—Try glycerine or soap suppositories at bedtime for the constipation. Also give the baby teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia three times a day.

R. S., Curtice, Ohio.—Have your doctor remove them by using the actual cautery.

R. S. K., St. Louis, Mo.—Remove the blackheads with the comedone extractor, and apply at night lotio alba, referred to, in COMFORT so often. This lotion can be obtained from your local druggist.

MRS. A. J., Soldiers Grove, Wis.—For your itching dandruff and falling hair, fill the hair with raw linseed oil at night; wash out with a tar soap the following morning, and apply to the scalp a two per cent solution of resorcin. Repeat the resorcin every three days.

MISS A. H., Murray Cross, Ala.—Ichthyol ointment in any strength can be obtained at any reliable drug store. We do not send medicines to any one.

MISS G. K., Memphis, Mo.—You are probably somewhat neurotic. Besides, you have the ear trouble and the lump in the breast. Both should be operated on, and at once. Lumps in a woman's breast are always dangerous; and an operation is indicated. If, as you say, you can live on one meal a day and be more comfortable than by eating more, do so, and let that meal suffice. You might also take three assafœtida pills a day, five grains in strength.

MRS. C. H., Monument, Oregon.—Epilepsy, or petit mal, is, in our judgment, incurable. At best it can only be temporized with and the attacks possibly made to occur less frequently. One of the most important things to look after in a case of this kind is the diet. It should be simple, almost free from meat or nitrogenous foods, also sweets should be avoided in any form. Water should be drunk freely, and the bowels be moved at least two or three times a day. As to the treatment, bromides are indicated. Elixir of the four bromides is a good remedy. This and all medication should be carried on only under the advice and care of the local physician.

B. B., Fulton, Ala.—Try Basham's mixture in tablespoonful doses after meals for your run-down condition caused by over-work. This will build you up and no doubt remove your back pains and, in general, help you.

MRS. E. D. P., Three Lakes, Wash.—Give her compound cascara sagrada mixture, three times a day, or often enough to give her a good movement of the bowels. This remedy can be obtained at any drug store.

MISS L. C., Jacksonville, Ala.—For your itching and painful lids, bathe the eyes daily in boric acid solution. One teaspoonful boric acid to the pint of water. Apply at night, to the lids, a little yellow oxide of mercury ointment—one per cent in strength.

MRS. W. R., Yucanville, Ohio.—Try, for the extra weight, the remedies we have so often published in COMFORT. A quart of skim milk in divided doses as follows: One glass in the morning, one at noon, one at four o'clock and the last glass at night. Use this diet on alternate days, and, on the other days, live on a non-starchy diet. Avoid sweets of all kinds. Dandruff can be cured by using resorcin in alcohol and water. Use two per cent of resorcin in this solution. Electric needle is the only remedy for superfluous hair. Freckles can be removed by applying a solution of bichloride of mercury to the parts. Both of the above remedies must be applied and prescribed by your local doctor. There are several effective corn remedies on the market.

MISS F. VAMP, Tiffin, Ohio.—American oil and all similar oils come from oil wells. They are reliable and safe to be taken at any and all times. Pure olive oil can, no doubt, be gotten at any wholesale grocery house. Best oil of this nature comes from Italy.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

I do not waste any more paper and ink than is necessary, but I was squatted by my desk, trying to decipher just when it was that I had dropped into the sisters' quarters and what I had said about their "Uncle" at 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, and was about to write severe words to the mailing department of COMFORT, asking them to have Uncle Samuel bring me the October number immediately when the landlady appeared at my room with two copies in separate wrappers and eight seconds later I was wading through the voluminous pages and in forty seconds more found my name in the "Corner" where the sisters meet; and there set up in type was a letter I had written to COMFORT'S Editor.

One thousand is rather a small number of the COMFORT readers but if that many will promise ten dollars each toward Uncle Charlie's Home Fund I will be the odd fellow and also give ten dollars and will pay same on demand at any time, any day of the week and at any hour of the day. Everybody but the baby knows that there are eleven thousand, eleven hundred and eleven listed among the subscribers who could give ten dollars each and forget it in two weeks. Selah.

Furthermore, if it can be done legally or otherwise honorably to affix a ten-cent war tax upon every subscriber then I will give the first or last dime according to order.

A cousin of the weatherman says there are no slackers among the COMFORT subscribers but all of them have not learned the lesson in the parable of the ten guests who "slumbered and slept."

MACDONALD.

Mr. Macdonald.—Now aren't you glad you started something? Just look at all the dimes, quarters, dollars and even five dollars, you (and Verne Ellis) were instrumental in bringing to Uncle Charlie. Come again.—Ed.

VIRGINIA.

DEAR SISTERS:

Third time is out, they say. This is the third time I've rapped. I do believe I hear someone coming. Yes, it is surely Mrs. Wilkinson. Good morning, dear. I will sit by Nelle Fischer if she doesn't mind. Isn't it a blessed privilege to air our views through this blessed corner?

Criss, I certainly enjoyed your letter. Come again.

Thanks, Jude, for the compliment to Bachelor Bill. It may have taken some of the conceit out of him but nearly all of us are conceited one way or another.

I'll bet you are getting curious as to my looks so I'll enlighten you. Five feet, four, blue-grey eyes, medium complexion, brown hair, and age—between sixteen and twenty-two. Am another one cut out for an old maid, but I should worry.

I am sending a little poem which I think is very pretty.

It's Sunshine and Music

"A laugh is just like sunshine,
It freshens all the day,
It tips the peak of life with light
And drives the clouds away;
The soul grows glad that hears it,
And feels its courage strong—
A laugh is just like sunshine
For cheering folks along.

"A laugh is just like music,
It lingers in the heart,
And where its melody is heard
The ills of life depart;
And happy thoughts come crowding
Its joyful notes to greet—
A laugh is just like music
For making living sweet."

(Author Unknown.)

Isn't that true, sisters? We should try to make happy those that are unfortunate. Give them a smile or a cheery word and see the difference it makes. We should cultivate a happy, smiling disposition.

I agree with the sisters about naming farms. Here are some I like: Pine Grove, Forest Dale, Lakeview, Rocky Branch, Greencastle, Verbena and Silver Dale.

With best wishes to one and all,

A COMFORT Friend, SADIE E. W. P.

SOMEWHERE IN INDIANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON, SISTER'N AND BRETHERN:

Seeing how numerous the old maids and bachelors are becoming in our corner has encouraged me to brace up and seek to gain admittance, something I never expected to have courage enough to attempt.

I am an ancient spinster of thirty-two and while I'm not exactly tickled over it no one need waste any sympathy on me for I really do not need it. In fact, I'm rather proud that I've reached such a ripe old age without coming to some worse end than spinsterhood.

We live in the fertile river valley of the good old Hoosier State, where 'most anything can be grown, but wheat, corn and timothy are the three great crops. Land sells for around $200 per acre but it is very hard to buy as it is continually increasing in value and the owners do not like to give it up. I am all the "women folks" in our family and have been the housekeeper for ten years. I do not know what it is to be lonely as I always have more work planned than I can ever accomplish. I do a great deal of church work and while the war was on our Uncle Sam kept me rather busy. Then there's always the neighbors to help—and I do have the loveliest neighbors.

Have lived in the country all my life and, of course, think it the life, and yet there are times—for instance, last harvest when I had been cooking for threshers for a week and had another supper yet on my hands, and it was ninety in the shade, and the perspiration was determined to drip off my long nose into the noodles, and my little flivver stood lone and lorn in the shed with a flat tire and dirt streaks up its back—and then the town people, their day's work done, began passing in their shining cars, going down to the river to spend the evening on or in the water—well, then I might have exchanged places.

Aren't the letters interesting? And I like the babies' pictures, especially the twins and triplets! And how Bachelor Bill's ears must burn. Now I rather enjoyed his letters and I know he doesn't hate us. And wasn't Sweet Sixteen just a wee bit catty? Dear child, there are worse fates than to be an old maid though perhaps I didn't think so when I was sixteen.

Mrs. Wilkinson, dear. I know you'll never print this letter and I shan't blame you one bit. On the contrary, I haven't the least doubt but that I shall feel relieved if you don't for though I've written for publication half my life I never see anything of mine in print without an awful "sneaky" feeling, just as I felt in a horrible dream the other night. I dreamed that I went to church and on arriving there found I was clothed only in my "nightie."

With love to everybody, I will sign myself,

CONTRARY MARY.

Contrary Mary.—Do you feel that way, too? Here's a secret: I never read any of my comments without thinking, "Wasn't that a fool thing to say? Why don't you say something that is clever and will help someone?" But my scoldings are all in vain.—Ed.

CAROLINA.

BON JOUR:

How many of the sisters like to read? I find great pleasure in it. I think good books are written for a purpose. Example: "The Scarlet Letter," by Hawthorne, shows that the consequences of sin cannot be escaped and that many lives are influenced by one wrong deed. Take the poem, "The Rainy Day," by Longfellow; it develops in us the qualities of patience, resignation and hopefulness. All our days cannot be golden. Some must be dark and dreary. If you do not care as much for poetry, read "Martha-by-the-Day," by Lippman, and "The Amazing Adventures of Letitia Carberry," by Mary Roberts Rinehart. Both are fine to drive the blues away if you ever get 'em. Martha and Letitia are such good-natured characters that you'll fall in love with them.

Wouldn't it be grand to have a stack of good, clean books, and interesting magazines? And supposing that stack were in a cozy room with a wood fire. Who

SECRET OF WOMAN'S SUCCESS

How You Can Have a Winning Personality

IF YOU WISH

SO many imagine that charm is a rare gift accorded by the fairies at birth. If the gay sprites have put their mark of favor upon you, you are singularly fortunate, but if they passed you by you are just plain unlucky, and there is nothing you can do about it. This is wrong, so wrong. The secret of charm, of a winning personality, of a presence which draws others to you as the magnet draws the needle, can be gained by any woman who truly wishes it.

WHY I KNOW

I make this statement confidently, for I know whereof I speak. During my years, both here in America and abroad, I had boundless opportunity to study intimately women in all walks of life, women of high and low degree, the grande dame, wrapped in priceless furs, motoring in the Bois du Boulogne, and the chic little milliner from the specialty shop on the Rue de la Paix. So many wonderful things have come out of France that it is scarcely surprising that her women have the ability to enwrap life and those about them with a rose-colored glow which is one of the many secrets of the French woman's irresistible attraction.

THE MAGIC WAND

If you had the ability to remake yourself, if you could wave a wand and be just what you have always dreamed, would you do it? I am sure you would. Now, I have this wand, this magic stick which has so often transformed the ugliest duckling into a beautiful swan. I may be the Fairy Godmother to your dearest dreams. Possibly it is some trifling habit that stands in the way of your having a truly winning personality. If you only put the proper rules into use you should improve amazingly.

You no longer need to envy other women. You have it in your power to obtain admiration, to command attention, to become winsome—to succeed in your aims.

HOW TO HOLD THE INTEREST OF MEN

Juliette Fara

For all they are so confident and masterful, men are "only boys grown tall." They are not so hard to please—if you know how! Often you will hear someone ask: "What do big men see in those tiny fluffy women?" The tiny fluffy women have, possibly, the gift of adaptability. They know how to fit into a man's moods—to hearten him when he is down, to charm him when he is glum.

THE FRENCH WOMAN'S ALLURE

This ability is native born with most French girls and is another of their secrets of attraction. What they have done and do is possible for you, also. It does not require any great skill or expense. It takes only two things—the desire to accomplish plus understanding. The desire to accomplish must come from you. The understanding I can give you, if you will let me.

HOW TO WIN

You should adopt some of these secrets of the French women. They are easily acquired. Remember, I refer to winsome ways which the most modest and respectable person may use. And I am sure this includes you, dear reader.

I WANT SO MUCH TO HELP

After coming back from abroad I decided that, beyond everything else, I wanted to see the American girl wear a world-wide crown as "The Girl with Super-Charm." So I collected all the data, methods and experiences I had obtained in France to put at your disposal. I wanted every American woman and American girl to share with me the secrets of fascination.

ADORABLE VIRGINIA PEARSON

What an artist she is! How she keeps you spell-bound with eyes, lips, gesture and pose,—while in private life she is known as one of the most lovable and loyal of women.

Next time you see her watch how she uses just those secrets which Juliette Fara would like to share with you. Read what this charming film star has to say.

"Success in life is due largely to personality. A girl who ordinarily might be unnoticed—I mean the commonplace sort of girl—should be able to take Juliette Fara's course "Winning Personality for Women," and become a shining light in whatever sphere she is best adapted. It is really astonishing how many secrets of personality are to be found in this Course."

(Signed) VIRGINIA PEARSON.

YOU CAN BE ATTRACTIVE

It is not necessary to be a great beauty or to possess a brilliant mind or to wear stunning clothes to have this power of fascination. How many times in your own experience have you watched a really homely woman, surrounded by men, the very center of attention? How many times have you seen a self-made girl, one who has perhaps only just managed to finish grammar school, the most feted and courted girl of your acquaintance? Can't you recall the first time you saw Emily Deane, who, apparently without effort, became engaged to the most eligible young man in town? You looked at her and remarked cuttingly: "Why, she hasn't even clothes. She's only a plain little thing! How did she get him?"

Oh, yes! Emily was a plain little thing; she wore a skirt that was shiny, but she had that something which is greater than beauty, or brains or clothes. She had the charm of an attractive personality.

CULTIVATE WINSOMENESS

So often I have seen possibilities in some woman, some young girl, that needed only a hint to bring out all the best qualities in her. Dozens of times I have felt like going up to some woman and saying: "I know a secret which will completely change your whole life! Will you let me tell it to you?" But I couldn't very well so accost a stranger, could I?

But, oh! I do so want to share my knowledge with the hosts of eager-eyed girls and women in this America that I love. I want to let you profit by my experience. I know it will benefit you and make you happier and more alive, as well as markedly successful.

THE VALUE OF PERSONALITY

I have been astounded at the difference in outlook, in opportunity, that the absence of personality makes in the lives of those who, lacking this one necessary attribute, really lack everything. I have made an exhaustive study of this subject—in railway carriages, on board ship, in the dining-rooms of the great hotels, not only in England and on the Continent, but right here in our own America. I know that there are hundreds of women who need certain private information to change from wall flowers and failures to popularity and success.

OVERCOME YOUR IMPERFECTIONS

If you are shy and bashful I can show you how to overcome these failings.

If you are aggressive and brusque I can show you how to tone down so that you will attract where heretofore you have repelled. If you are vain, or boisterous, or one of those who, without earning it, demand that you be the center of attention, I can give you a friendly, helping hand, so that you will be sought after rather than snubbed.

A BOOK FREE TO YOU

I have put some of my secrets into a little book called "How" that I want you to read. The Gentlewoman Institute will send it to you entirely free, postpaid, in a plain wrapper, just for the asking.

My advice to you is to send without delay for this free book "How." I know that you want to possess happiness and contentment and gain all those good things of life which come to you as the result of having a winning personality. "How" will show you the way.

What is your favorite hymn? I have so many I can't tell which one in particular but one is "Nearer My God to Thee."

Terry.—"That's nothin', our big 'uns simply ask, 'Wot address?'"

Sunshine.—"Goodnatured" may be the word to use in describing "Tish" but I'd say that "strong-minded was better. Martha is a dear and a most lovable character. We always need something to laugh about so why wouldn't it be a good idea for all the sisters, or those humorously inclined, to send in a funny joke—the joke that makes you laugh every time you think of it. Want to? —Ed.

BATTLEFIELD, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Since I was knee high to a grasshopper I have read good old COMFORT, from cover to cover and then I read the covers. After that I read most of it over again. Nothing escapes me that is printed in COMFORT. Last week my oldest son came from the mail box and said, "Mamma, be sure to renew for COMFORT, our time's out. Let's not miss any." The whole family told me the same thing so I am sending the renewal price under separate cover and am making my first attempt to enter the enchanted circle called COMFORT'S Sisters' Corner. If this passes censor I would be pleased to see it printed—for—

You say my time for COMFORT'S out,
And oh, my lawsy daisy!
It will not do to have it stop,
The family would go crazy.
For Cubby Bear suits little Joe,
The poetry for Fannie,
Uncle Charlie, Lewis loves,
The Veterinary, Danny.
Edward hunts up Traps and Thrills—
And Papa reads the stories;
Then Mamma gets the paper down
And in the letters glories.
Then Talks with Girls and Beauty Hints
At once catch Ersha's eye,
Manners and Looks and Farmers' page
Lester and Orville spy.
Auto Hints and Engine Helps
Is what the men desire;
Is there a recipe for pie to eat?
We now hear Ruth inquire.
Poultry Farming we all like
And think the pictures dandy,
While all the book, from front to back,
Is every bit as handy.
I've read the paper ever since
I was a little girlie,
And now my children watch for it,
And read it late and early.
Please count my sub in on a chair
For someone who'd enjoy it,
I cannot think of any place
I could as well employ it.
Would like to see this rhyme in print,
It is the first I've written,
The letters all are each so fine,
I doubt if this is "fitten."
But when you wrote, "Your paper's out,"
Oh my, lawsy daisy!
Every person on the place
Came 'bout nigh runnin' crazy.
And so I'm sending in the price
Of another year's subscription,
I think this news will strengthen them
Without an M. D.'s prescription.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have read COMFORT only one year but have learned to like the Sisters' Corner very much.

I am five feet, six inches tall and have dark hair, brown eyes and a fair complexion. Am 26 years old and weigh 120 pounds.

My husband is a carpenter and we have only land enough for a garden and sweet potato patch. We keep fifty chickens.

CHESTER AND LESTER ELLIS.

I am the mother of five children. Lish, aged seven, is in the Deaf and Dumb School at Talladega, Ala. Ruth is five. Marlin died when he was one year old. Chester and Lester are the twins and I am sending their photograph which I would like to see in COMFORT. They are nineteen months old, though only one year old when this photograph was taken.

With best wishes to all COMFORT readers,

MRS. LETTIE ELLIS.

slightest indication of looseness of the bowels, remove the drinking water and replace with cold tea or rice water. It is a good precaution to feed boiled rice two or three times a week whilst the chicks are little, and if they develop any serious trouble, keep them under cover; or if with a hen, keep the hen shut in a brooder coop, for then she is much more likely to brood than if allowed to run alone.

Leg weakness rarely if ever develops if the chickens are properly fed. Green food and animal food must form part of their rations. There is a meat meal on the market which is very good if you can buy in small quantities, but it is not safe to buy a large bag which can't be used up in two or three weeks, so it is usual for the ordinary farm to depend on curd cheese and an occasional hard-boiled egg, chopped up fine without removing the shell. And as for green stuff, I don't think there is anything so good as young clover and the sprouts of young onions, of course chopped fine enough to be acceptable to little chicks. If you are where you can get beef's liver, it is the best of all animal food when about half boiled and chopped and fed in small quantities. If your birds have had any kind of animal feed from the start, it is quite safe; but if you suddenly commence feeding it after four or five weeks, you must go very carefully for some time, until they become accustomed to it. A rusty nail or two, or a few drops of tincture of iron in the drinking water is a good tonic, and it is advisable to use it if chickens commence to look pale around the bill, or droopy in any way.

M. D.—Stronger chickens and better results are generally obtained by using two-year-old hens in the breeding pens. The best way to work up a flock of good layers is to select the earliest and heaviest layers from year-old stock, and allow them free range with good grain and vegetable food, but no extra stimulating rations, to force production of eggs during the second winter. In this way your two-year-old hens will be full of strength and vigor in the spring, when you want their eggs for hatching. But I don't think the trouble which you have been having during the last four years has been caused entirely by using pullets which have been forced for eggs during the winter as breeders. From your description of the spots on the livers of the chicks which you examined after death, I am inclined to think that you have got some hens in your flock which are slightly infected by the microbes which cause the disease of the liver which most frequently attacks turkeys and is commonly known as blackhead. Until the last few years it was generally supposed that the disease was confined entirely to turkeys, but now we know that all fowls are subject to attack, though they rarely show any outward symptoms, and the disease never gains very much headway with them, though the germs are spread broadcast through the agency of their droppings, and when picked up by young chickens or turkeys, enter the digestive organs with their food or drink, and an inflamed condition of the intestines causes rapid death among the young stock. The condition of the liver is caused by the blood carrying germs into the liver, when numerous centers of the disease appear, and show yellowish spots, which, when cut across, will be found to be irregularly-globular in shape. It is not positively known whether the germs of this disease are present in the eggs laid by the affected hens or turkeys, but there is no doubt that they are present on the shell, which collects the germs from the bird as the egg passes through the egg passage. It is for this reason that all eggs should be wiped with alcohol before being put under the hens or in incubators. The germs of the above diseases are apt to linger in incubators and brooders, and frequently originate in old hay, moldy ground or other waste matter. So, as a matter of prevention, incubators should be disinfected after each hatch, and brooders before each new set of chicks is put into them, and nesting material for setting hens should be clean, sweet hay. As you have a good flock of hens, it seems a pity to part with them, and really not necessary, if you will work along the lines of prevention. Thoroughly clean and disinfect all the houses at frequent intervals. Have the yards or ground where the hens are in the habit of congregating covered with fresh lime, which should be turned under after twenty-four hours. If it is possible to seed the ground, so much the better—it will sweeten it. Add a thimbleful of permanganate of potassium to every four quarts of drinking water until February. This will kill the germs which the hens may be carrying. For young chicks once attacked there is no cure, though giving them sour milk to drink from the time they are hatched is supposed to act as a preventive.

C. C.—The birds have coccidiosi, a disease produced by a very small form of animal life called coccidia, which are very widely distributed in nature, but with poultry the disease is nearly always the result of direct contagion. It may attack the digestive or the air tubes. In your flock the air tubes are evidently the seat of the disease, to judge from the condition you found in the windpipe. The best treatment is to put three grains of copperas, or 15 grains of catechu in every four quarts of drinking water. They should also have two doses, twenty-four hours apart, of castor oil. Give two tablespoonfuls of oil, mixed with six drops of oil of turpentine, as the coccidia may be present on eggs laid by infected fowls. It is well to be very careful at this season of the year about eggs for hatching. This form of contagion is very difficult to eradicate, so use very strong disinfectants on all the fixtures, drinking and other dishes, and remove and burn all scratching material. Burn the carcasses of all birds that die, or that you think it best to kill.

D. H. W.—You haven't given me sufficient information about the birds and their condition to form the slightest idea of what the trouble may be. If you will send me a fuller description, I shall be very glad to help you.

C. J.—This is a case of canker—a mildly contagious disease. Mix equal parts of pulverized camphor, boric acid, and subnitrate of bismuth. Blow into the bird's throat and nostrils with a straw or glass tube, using about one third of a teaspoonful each time.

D. L. W.—The turkeys have what is commonly called blackhead, a disease of the liver which has gained its common name from the fact that the turkey's head sometimes turns black, or rather dark purple. The disease once having a firm hold on birds, doctoring is of little use. The only really practical way to fight the disease is along the lines of prevention. Please read answer to M. D. in this issue. It will give you some ideas about how to safeguard your young birds during the coming season.

A. B. C.—I think the young birds must have been overcrowded, or the chicken house is damp and poorly ventilated. If the birds are crowded close together on the roost at night, they get overheated; especially in the fall, and chilled when they get off the roost in the morning. If you have glass windows in the house, take them out, and cover the openings with canvas, so that there is plenty of fresh air in the house. Drafts, damp and dirt, are chickens' worst enemies. As the symptoms you describe all belong to cold, and bowel trouble resulting from colds, birds which show no signs of illness would be all right for the table.

L. E. S.—Your late summer and fall chickens suffered from gapes, a disease which is caused by a small parasite worm which enters the bird's windpipe. It originates on the ground on which poultry has run for some time. Young chickens get infected by picking up and eating small earthworms which act as hosts to the parasites. Your spring chickens possibly escaped the trouble because they were kept more closely confined; besides which, in the early spring the weather is not warm and damp enough to encourage the development of the gapeworm. To safeguard this year's chicks please put your brood coops or brooders on fresh ground where poultry has not been in the habit of congregating, or, if that is not convenient, cover the old ground with fresh lime, and after twelve hours or so, have it plowed under, and sow to oats, rye or grass.

C. P. O.—There is a non-freezing drinking fountain on the market for which you have to use a lamp. But your birds will be just as well off if you will give them fresh warm water three times a day. I think turkeys do better when they roost in an open shed. Stop the use of any germ killer by the first of February. Read answer to M. D. in this issue. It will help you.

J. T.—The chickens must have got some poisonous material. Have you been using fertilizers or fresh lime on farm land, or is there any stagnant water about the place? Not knowing the exact cause of any of the surrounding conditions, I can only suggest that you give each bird a dose of castor oil as soon as you see any signs of sickness—about two tablespoonfuls for each bird.

H. A. M.—This is a case of vent gleet. The disease generally originates through an egg being broken in the egg bag, which causes inflammation, septic poisoning and finally develops vent gleet. From the hen the male bird becomes infected and spreads the disease through the flock. If you wish to doctor them, proceed in the following manner: Hold the bird's vent in hot water to which has been added some strong antiseptic. After fifteen or twenty minutes, wipe with a clean, soft rag and rub the vent all round with unguentine or mercury ointment. Be very careful to wash your hands in disinfectant after handling the birds, and burn all the rags used in drying.

15 EGGS A DAY FROM 23 HENS, IN WINTER

Mr. Duni's Hens Increased Every Day. Plan Is Easily Tried.

"We have 23 chickens and hadn't had an egg all winter. In five days after feeding Don Sung we got four to five eggs a day; in three weeks we were getting 10 to 12 eggs a day; in five weeks we got 15 to 19 eggs a day."—John Duni, Box 102, Cherry Valley, Pa.

Mr. Duni started giving his hens Don Sung in January, in zero weather. He now keeps his hens busy in cold weather, when hens usually stop laying. A trial costs nothing. Here's our offer:

Give your hens Don Sung and watch results for one month. If you don't find that it pays for itself and pays you a good profit besides simply tell us and your money will be promptly refunded.

Don Sung (Chinese for egg-laying) works directly on the egg-laying organs, and is also a splendid tonic. It is easily given in the feed, improves the hen's health, makes her stronger and more active in any weather, and starts her laying.

Try Don Sung for 30 days and if it doesn't get you the eggs, no matter how cold or wet the weather, your money will be refunded by return mail. Get Don Sung from your druggist or poultry remedy dealer or send 50 cents for a package by mail prepaid. Burrell-Dugger Co., 445 Columbia Bldg., Indianapolis, Ind.

a question of some of the COMFORT sisters and will return favor in any way I can.

I paint a little with oil paints and would like to know how to burn the china painted to keep paint from washing off. Can any of the readers tell me how. I would be very thankful for the information.

With best regards to all, MRS W. C. G.

Mrs. W. C. G.—Mindful of a resolution made some years ago, to do one good deed each day, I wended my way to the Public Library where I procured several books on china painting and spent part of an afternoon in an effort to learn something that would help you. I learned more than I ever knew about the subject before but space is too limited to take it up fully but it would seem that complete instructions would come with the kiln for, of course, you know that the colors are burned in. My hopes of a career as an artist were dashed to the ground years ago when a little girl, my youngest pupil, said, "Oh, lo-o-o-ok at the lo-o-o-ve-ly dandelions teacher made." The "lovely dandelions" in question being so natural (as I thought) looking chrysanthemums I had painted on her Thanksgiving booklet. Wasn't that enough to discourage anyone? I shall be glad to help in buying kiln or instruction books if you wish me to.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Have you room in your corner for a little "soldier" girl? I returned from France last fall where for eighteen months I drove a Red Cross ambulance.

It surely is great to be back in the land of Old Glory after having spent so many months at the battle front. I enlisted in the Motor Corps at Pittsburg over two years ago and spent four months in training school and then I came home one morning early to bid my dear mother and father good by—I had been ordered to France.

I won't go into detail about my voyage over, although I was very sick. I spent a few days in Paris before leaving for the front. I took an active part in several small battles. After the men had "gone over" the top" we drove up in the ambulances and picked up the wounded men and drove to the nearest field hospital. At times I have gone for three days and nights without closing my eyes. At night we were never allowed a light on our car. The reason for this was so an enemy airplane could not see us and send a shell down on us. At times when I was driving over the battlefield, shells have burst not two feet from my car and three times I had shells go through my car, but, thank God, I came home without a scratch.

And what wonderful work the Salvation Army lassies did for us. The K. of C. and Red Cross were very good to us also. If the people at home could have been "over there" as we were and seen what brave people they were, they would never need to solicit for the money would roll in by the handful and there would be no need of a "drive" for funds.

My dear sisters, I shall never forget the brave boys I have seen die. Many times I have closed their eyes and have written down their last words to send to loved ones back home. If you could have seen the German soldiers and have known what beasts they were you would say the war should never have ended until every German had been killed. My brother was killed in France and I am well and home now but if I thought I could avenge my brother's death by going back tomorrow I would go willingly.

MARJORIE A. SMITH.

Maid Marjorie.—You are a brave girl and we are glad to have you with us. Come again. There must be many more "soldier girls" among COMFORT's subscribers and letters from them would be gladly received.—Ed.

ASTORIA, 52 Ninth St., OREGON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have, for a long time, been a reader of dear old COMFORT but have never written for I have always found the other letters more interesting than anything I could write, but now I want to ask a favor.

My sister lost her only son during the war and is anxious to hear from someone who was with him. As COMFORT visits so many thousand homes we thought some of the boys who were in his company might see this and write to us so we could learn the particulars of his death.

Corp. Fred E. Prosser, enlisted at Fowler, Cal., July 30, 1917, in the 34th Co., 1st Replacement Bat., U. S. Marines and sailed for France, Feb. 1, 1918. Was transferred to Co. L, 5th Regiment, on June 18, 1918, and was killed June 24, 1918, while operating a machine gun in Chateau Thierry. This was during the fighting in Belleau Woods.

Hoping to hear from someone, I am, sincerely,

MRS. J. A. SHAW.

Complete Crochet Outfit Given

THIS offer is for the woman and girl who "loves her crocheting" and insists upon having the best of everything to work with. In this outfit we give you any desired quantity of Dexter Cordonnette "Silko" crochet and tatting cotton, and three of the highest grade crochet needles. There is no better crochet and tatting cotton than Dexter "Silko"—a fact already known to thousands of our women readers. It is made of the best Sea Island cotton with a twist that makes it lie flat, is highly mercerized and actually improves with washing. It is smooth to the fingers and will not kink. With Dexter "Silko," crocheting is more easily done—and the finished pieces are far more beautiful and useful than if made with cheaper grade cotton. Dexter "Silko" for crocheting comes in all the popular colors—white, ecru, pink, rose pink, light blue, delph blue, king blue, sapphire and sea green, and in sizes 3, 10, 30, 50 and 70. The tatting cotton comes in the same colors and of the size always used for this work.

The three steel crochet needles are the finest made, 5 inches long, nickel plated, perfectly formed and balanced, with flattened finger hold, and a nickel cap that slips on over the end, protecting it when not in use. This cap also prevents the sharp point from doing any damage when carried in the pocket, handbag or work basket. We give you three different sizes of needles—8, 10 and 12.

Buy Pure Drugs

IT is highly important that any drug used for farm animals shall be pure and of known efficiency. Often drugs not sold by experts or reputable druggists are adulterated. Such may fail to do what is expected of them and it also is possible that some of them may prove poisonous.

Some of the turpentine now on the market is adulterated with pine oil or wood naphtha. It is known as "turpentine substitute" and is intended for use in paint. But turpentine of that "fake" sort may be sold if one buys his supplies at a paint store, or from a painter, or elsewhere than at a drug store. That often has occurred and the adulterated drug has killed horses. It causes severe pain, scouring, cramps and finally death. Only the purest or rectified turpentine should be given internally to a horse for worms or to a cow or sheep for bloat, or to swine to rid them of intestinal parasites.

Turpentine often is given in raw linseed oil; but that oil is very expensive now and so one may be sold cheap, adulterated oil instead of the pure article. Boiled linseed oil is poisonous. It has killed many a horse. Buy raw linseed oil at the drug store and have the druggist guarantee that it is the pure article, telling him that it is to be given internally. If pure raw linseed oil cannot be bought at a fair price, then give the dose of turpentine in new milk. Medicinal mineral oil may be used instead of raw linseed oil, as a physic, and gives very good results. There is no danger in using it and it therefore is to be preferred to linseed oil about which there is any doubt.

Insect powders often fail to destroy lice, fleas or ticks on animals. They are much used during winter when a fluid cannot well be employed. The reason that they prove ineffective is that they are adulterated. Mountaineers in some parts of the country collect and dry ox-eye daisy flowers and trade them to the local merchant for groceries and other supplies. These flowers are ground and mixed with pyrethrum, Persian and Dalmatian insect powders to make them cheaper. They also dilute the poisonous properties of the powder. Microscopic examination readily detects the added alien flower fruits. Add powdered tobacco, or sabadilla, freely to the ordinary insect powder before use. Also add flowers of sulphur.

ABNORMAL MILK.—What ails my cows? One is nine years old and the other is five and both are in fine condition, showing no sign of any disease. When first milked it looks all right. After a thick, heavy cream rises it is dark and watery looking and has a slightly salt taste, not fit to use after a few hours, turns a pinkish color and never clabbers as it should. The udder and teats are in good condition. MRS. O. D. P.

A.—Bacteria in the milk utensils or wash water commonly cause such conditions in milk and cream. Set a sample of milk from each quarter in a separate vessel to see if all of the milk is similarly affected. It is barely possible that milk from one or two diseased teats may be causing the trouble. It is much more likely that bacteria are to blame. Perfectly cleanse, scald and sun dry the milk utensils and set the milk in a new, clean, well ventilated place. Use only boiled water for cleansing purposes. Also sterilize the churn.

CHRONIC COLLAR SORES.—My mare has sore shoulders. I stopped working her for months. As soon as I work her again they become sore. V. S.

A.—The only effectual treatment in such cases is to have the old sores cut out by a trained veterinarian and then wet the wounds two or three times a day with "white lotion" composed of one ounce of sugar of lead and six drams of sulphate of zinc in a pint of soft, cold water. Label the bottle "poison" and shake it well before use.

BLOOD IN MILK.—Please tell me what ails my cow. Her appetite is fine and she appears to be in the best of health, but when I milk her she gives bloody milk from the hind teats. Sometimes there will be one or two milkings without any sign of blood in it, and then the next time I milk it will be back again. It is when I finish milking that it shows. MRS. J. R.

A.—It is probable that growths in the teats bleed from irritation at milking time and if so an operation for their removal might succeed. If the growths are high up in the teat, however, it often is best to let a calf suck or to dry off the milk flow in the affected quarters. When growths are not present, treat by bathing the quarters twice daily with cold water and vinegar and giving the cow a teaspoonful of dried sulphate of iron and three of salt in her feed once daily, provided she is not in calf.

AILING COW.—I have a cow five years old, that at times seems stiff all over. She has the hollow horn at times. I would like to know what to do for her. O. T. D.

A.—There is no such disease as "hollow horn." In malignant catarrh, however, pus may get into the hollow cores of the horns as they connect with the nostrils and sinuses of the skull. We suspect that the cow has tuberculosis, which is contagious and incurable. To determine the matter, you should have the cow tested with tuberculin. Any trained veterinarian can apply the test. The milk of a tuberculous cow is dangerous to man and animals.

STRINGHALT.—I have a two-year old colt that became stringhalted when one year old. Is there a cure for it? MRS. M. W.

A.—The operation of peroneal tenotomy often succeeds in such cases, but it can only be performed by a trained veterinarian. The good effects of the operation do not always become manifest at once; but should occur inside of two or three months. Consult your local graduate veterinarian about the matter.

SICK HOGS.—I have a fat hog that has large sores and scabs all over it. My hogs are dying. I lost a fine sow the other day. She had five pigs four weeks old. She was well at night, ate her food, and was dead the next morning. I also lost a nice shoat, and a young sow with several pigs. Every case worked differently. W. I. D.

A.—Dip the hog in a solution of coal tar dip made according to directions given by the manufacturer and add enough crude oil to coat the surface at time of use. Repeat in ten days if thought necessary. Such sores usually come from wet and filth in pens, beds or yards. Clean up, disinfect and whitewash the houses and pens. Your troubles will be likely to lessen if you provide sanitary quarters for the hogs; but a qualified veterinarian should be employed at once to determine if a contagious disease is present, and if that proves to be so he can vaccinate the remaining hogs.

LAME COW.—I have a cow nearly six years old that has very sore feet in the split part of the hoof, swelling some above the hoof. I feed corn and clover hay. She gives three gallons of milk a day. Is it fit to use? W. D.

A.—Place the cow in a roomy, clean box-stall and bed with shavings or sawdust. Keep her in until she is well. The milk may be used. Perfectly cleanse the affected feet, removing lodged corn-stalks or other foreign objects and cutting away all rotten, loose or under-run horn of hoofs. Then immerse for five minutes in hot water containing two ounces of sulphate of copper (bluestone) to the pint. Afterward saturate oakum or cotton batting with a five per cent solution of coal tar disinfectant and bind upon the sore parts with bandages. Renew the latter dressing once daily.

FITS.—My pet dog, a poodle, has spells when he trembles and trembles as though he had chills. He falls over and can't get on his feet. He has been this way for three years. I keep him most all the time in the house. What can I do for him? MRS. K. D.

A.—Let the dog run out daily and give it only one small feed each evening. Do not feed potatoes or sweets. Treat it for worms with medicine which you can buy at the drug store ready for use. Repeat the treatment in two weeks.

THRIFTLESS COLT.—I have a four-year old colt that was in fine condition until the middle of last March, when all at once he quit eating corn, losing flesh and eating just enough to keep him alive. I have tried all the remedies of which I know, but none have helped him. A. A. S.

A.—Without an examination we cannot tell what is wrong, but it is quite likely that blood worms are causing the weakness and emaciation. If so, you will find that the membranes of the eyelids are pale and that there is a fur of dandruff substance around the anus. Feed crushed oats, wheat bran and oilmeal, along with best of hay, and roots or a little silage. Milk is good for a colt in that condition and it should be well sweetened with blackstrap molasses; indeed, molasses should be freely fed. Have the teeth attended to by a veterinarian as milk tooth crowns or shells may have to be removed. Give half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning, after giving less doses daily for a week. Stop this medicine gradually when no longer needed.

DEATH OF CALF.—Will you tell me what was the matter with my calf? It was healthy until it was three months old, when it began to pant and was sick about eight days. I gave the calf epsom salts. What should I have done? MRS. M. L. W.

A.—The calf no doubt suffered from indigestion and may have had fits; but it is as likely that the dose of epsom salts went the wrong way into the lungs and caused death. Castor oil in milk would have been better treatment for indigestion and great care has to be taken not to cause suffocation.

LUMPS ON BODY.—I have a horse that has small lumps all over his back. They don't seem sore or itch. I would like to know the cause and a remedy. C. F.

A.—Sudden change of feed or a mild attack of indigestion often cause surfeit, also called nettlerash or urticaria and similar to hives in a child. It is not dangerous and soon passes off. Bathe affected parts twice daily with soft water containing an ounce of granular hyposulphite of soda to the quart and mix a tablespoonful of the same form of soda in the feed once daily. Always make all changes of feed gradually.

No More Wrinkles

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE

Superfluous Hair Vanishes Like Magic. Eyelashes Beautified

Pimples and Blackheads Removed Forever

Let this woman send you free, everything she agrees, and beautify your face and form quickly.

This clever woman has not a wrinkle upon her face; she has perfected a marvelous, simple method which brought a wonderful change in her face. For removing wrinkles, her method is truly wonderfully rapid.

She made herself the woman she is today and brought about the wonderful change in her appearance in a pleasant manner. Her complexion is as clear and fair as that of a child. She had thin, scrawny eye-lashes and eyebrows, which could scarcely be seen, and she made them long, thick and beautiful by her own methods and removed every blackhead and pimple from her face.

Nothing is taken into the stomach, no common massage, no harmful plasters, no worthless creams.

By her new process, she removes wrinkles and develops the whole figure plump and fat.

It is simply astonishing the hundreds of women who write in regarding the wonderful results from this new beauty treatment, which is beautifying their face and form after beauty doctors and other methods failed. She has thousands of letters on file like the following.

Mrs. M. L. B. Albin, Miss., writes: "I have used your beauty treatment with wonderful success. I have not a wrinkle on my face now and it is also improving my complexion, which has always troubled me with pimples and blackheads. My weight was 112 pounds before taking your treatment and now I weigh 117, a gain of 5 pounds. Your treatment is a God send to all thin women. I am so grateful you may even use my letter if you wish."

The valuable new beauty book which Madame Clare is sending free to thousands of women is certainly a blessing to women.

All our readers should write her at once and she will tell you absolutely free; about her various new beauty treatments and will show our readers:

How to remove wrinkles in 8 hours;
How to make long, thick eyelashes and eyebrows;
How to remove superfluous hair;
How to remove blackheads, pimples and freckles;
How to remove dark circles under the eyes;
How to quickly remove double chin;
How to build up sunken cheeks and add flesh to the body;
How to darken gray hair and stop hair falling;
How to stop forever perspiration odor.

Simply address your letter to Helen Clare, Suite A 227, 3311 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill., and don't send any money, because particulars are free, as this charming woman is doing her utmost to benefit girls or women in need of information which will add to their beauty and make life sweeter and lovelier in every way.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have read the letter from June Rose and she is having the same experience I had with my little girl. I will whisper it—I thought she was a dumhead and was ashamed to send her to school, for I couldn't teach her anything. One day I got up courage to visit the school and I was thunderstruck. That girl of mine was reading! I asked Miss B. how she did it and she said they learned by playing and they don't know they are studying. She drew a ladder on the board and put letters and words on each round of the ladder then they tried to see who could climb to the top of the ladder, by pronouncing each letter or word. If they could get to the top she pinned a flower or ribbon on their dresses or waists to show that they had their lesson perfectly. Many little games are played with their lessons and it is surprising how fast they learn and how anxious they are for each lesson.

I enjoy COMFORT and think the crochet patterns are fine.

Good night to all, MICHI-GOOSE.

TRACY CITY, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a reader of dear old COMFORT ever since I learned to read and I like the Sisters' Corner best of all.

I am five feet, six inches tall and weigh 138 pounds.

VICTOR FLOYD GROSS.

Have blue eyes and brown hair and am twenty years of age. I am married to one of the best of men.

I am sending my baby's picture which was taken when he was five months old. His name is Victor Floyd Gross.

If I am admitted this time I will come again.

MRS. EDGAR H. GROSS.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

Remove peach stains with spirits of camphor.

Grind tea leaves and you make your tea last longer.

Dampen grease stains with kerosene and wash as usual.

The syrup of sweet pickles may be used in place of cider in making mince pies.

Sprinkle starched clothes with soapy water and they will iron with a gloss.—ELSIE, LA.

When washing clothes put a teaspoonful of turpentine in boiler and the clothes will be much whiter.

Keep your stockings from getting runs by putting a row of machine stitches around each stocking, near the top.

It takes more sugar to sweeten fruit if added before or during the time the fruit is cooking. Cook first, then sweeten.

Before baking potatoes let them stand in hot water for fifteen minutes and they will bake in much less than the ordinary time.

When a loaf of bread becomes hard, wet it all over with cold water or milk and wrap it in a damp towel and place it in a hot oven for fifteen minutes.

Sprinkle a handful of finely crushed bread-crumbs over the top of berry pies before putting the crust on and the juice will not run out.—MRS. D. M., New Hampshire.

Sprinkle sugar under the fruit instead of on top when making fruit pies. By doing this the juice boils up through the fruit and not out of the crust as it is apt to do when sprinkled on top of fruit.

Straw matting makes a good dining table pad. Lay two strips across the table, letting the selvages come together in the center. Cut to fit table and bind with strip of cloth.—MRS. L. V. F., Greenfield, Ill.

TO REMOVE LETTERS FROM FLOUR SACKS.—(Requested). Soak in lukewarm water. Spread out on washboard and soap well and sprinkle with salt, then roll up and let remain ten or fifteen minutes. The letters should wash out then.—MRS. A. H., Ashwood, Texas.

Remedies

BED WETTING.—Make a tea by steeping half a package of water plantain, dried and crushed, in a pint of water for half an hour. Sweeten to taste. Give child half a teacupful twice a day.

HEADACHE.—Take a piece of brown paper about as wide as one's hand and long enough to go around the head and saturate it with vinegar and tie around the head.—MISS SADIE PRINTZ, Luray, Va.

COLD.— Take one half pint each vinegar and water and into it put one teaspoon of butter, a pinch of salt, sugar to sweeten and put on stove and let it get as hot as can be taken. Drink before retiring.

HAIR TONIC.—Mix powdered quinine one quarter part to three quarters part petroleum jelly and massage the scalp with this two or three times weekly. Get as little as possible on the hair and wear a cap to bed to avoid soiling the pillow. Shampoo the hair every two weeks.—SAUCY OKLAHOMAN.

CONSTIPATION.—The first thing on arising in the morning drink one pint, or two pints if need be, of tepid water, the same temperature as the body or perhaps a little warmer. After drinking, if your stomach feels disagreeable, just pat it briskly first on one side then on the other and in a moment it will pass out of the stomach and flush the bowels and kidneys and constipation vanishes. Do not eat anything before drinking the water.—VIOLA GARDNER, Salem, Ore.

Requests

How to pickle pig's feet.

I would like to get the book Lady Isabel's Daughter. Please write first.—MISS SADIE PRINTZ, Luray, Va.

I would like to get a June, 1917, number of COMFORT.—MRS. M. J. FLEMING, Buchanan, Box 12, N. Y.

Will some sister send me the August number of Good Stories.—MISS EDITH DEARING, Velpen, R. R. 2, Ind.

Please read them and remember that it is not too early to send in your order today.

Six One-Year Old Rose Bushes For One Subscription!

Hoosier Beauty In color, glowing crimson-scarlet, with darker shadings. The bud is of good length, ships well in the close-cut state, and opens into a magnificent bloom, quite dazzling in velvety brilliance. As soon as thoroughly established in the soil it sends out long, stiff growths with a bud on every shoot. It does not need to be pinched like Killarney or Richmond, but produces, naturally, stems two to three feet in length; each plant keeps up a very close succession of bloom, and again unlike Richmond it is a good summer Rose. It is a clean grower and very fragrant.

Francis Scott Key It is very fitting that such a fine new Rose should be honored with the name of the author of the "Star Spangled Banner." The flowers are from large to very large, with sixty or more petals opening to a high center. The color is a magnificent deep red rose. Wherever it has been staged this Rose has swept all competitors from the boards and secured every prize it has entered for.

Madame Marcel Delanney A surprisingly beautiful novelty raised by the introducers of the popular Rose Jonkheer J. L. Mock, and honored with the award of the Gold Medal of the Bagatelle Gardens at Paris, 1915. It is distinct and peculiar in color, a pale soft pink or rose shaded with hydrangea-pink. The flowers are very large, full and fragrant, perfect in form, and borne on rigid stems. The growth is vigorous and very floriferous.

Sunburst This magnificent giant yellow Rose is a fine forcer; it stands head and shoulders above all others of its color, and ranks with American Beauty and the Killarneys in value and grandeur. The color is orange-copper or golden-orange and golden-yellow; edge of petals lighter; all intense shades, extremely brilliant in effect. Some call the color cadmium-yellow. It is the yellowest of all Roses in the everblooming class.

Red Dorothy Perkins A combination of the brilliant Crimson Rambler flower on glossy, varnished Wichuraiana foliage. The defects of Crimson Rambler are its unsightly foliage in unseasonable weather, and its defoliation by insects, but the infusion of Wichuraiana blood assures an ornamental climber which is nearly evergreen. The flowers are very double, produced in large trusses of thirty to forty, and almost every eye on a shoot produces large clusters of flowers. The color is intense crimson-maroon, the tips of the petals tinged with scarlet. The finest of all red climbing Roses.

Florence Forrester Clear snow-white with a lemon tinge; as the flowers age they become a pure white; the blooms are even larger than Paul Neyron. Its habit is absolutely perfect, and the freedom with which it flowers is marvelous. This Rose is the grandest of all whites for bedding. For size and substance it has no equal among Hybrid Teas. Is very sweetly perfumed. Gold medal, National Rose Society.

Send Your Order Now—Supply Of Bushes Is Limited

OWING to the unfavorable weather last season which cut down the production of young rose bushes, the growers inform us that they may not be able to accept orders after February. For this reason you should send in your order at once, with the understanding that the bushes will be forwarded to you at the proper time for planting in your locality.

Send us only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents and we will give you the above described six rose bushes, sending them by prepaid parcel post, and guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. Premium No. 8571.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. M. F., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your husband deserted you immediately after your marriage, without any better reason than the one you state to us, you can compel him to provide for your support in a manner commensurate with his means and station in life, unless you have independent means of your own sufficient to provide for your support; we think it may be necessary for you to bring an action or proceeding against him to enforce your right to support from him.

A. H. B., Missouri.—Unders the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children, his widow would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, and a child's portion absolutely in his personal estate; we think he could leave his whole estate to his widow by will if he desires to do so.

MISS F. T., Missouri.—We are of the opinion that the laws of Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Washington and Wyoming prohibit marriages between first cousins.

E. B., Colorado.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the estate of an intestate descends to the surviving wife or husband, where no children or descendants of children are left by such intestate. An intestate is a person who dies without leaving a will.

MRS. L. R., New Jersey.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think your husband can compel you to support him if he is able to support himself. If you never had any child born alive to the marriage, we think you can bar your husband from any interest in your estate by will. The laws of your state have been somewhat unsettled of late years as to the wife's right to bar her husband from curtesy in her real estate by will; in order to establish a husband's right to curtesy in his wife's real estate it is necessary that a child must be born alive to the marriage. This right is established to the husband even though such child predeceases the husband. The husband's right of curtesy was abolished by the laws of New Jersey a few years ago but there has been some question as to the validity of the law.

MRS. S., Missouri.—We can form no opinion as to your sons' rights under your deceased husband's will without an examination of the will and a complete knowledge of the facts in connection with the administration of the estate.

MRS. F. I. H., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that children may be disinherited by will provided the testator possesses testamentary capacity, and provided no undue influence is exercised upon him, and provided the will is legally drawn and executed and expresses the testator's true intent. If the testator was under undue influence at the time he made the will you mention and if such influence caused him to favor one of his children more than the others, we think the probate of the will should be contested or an action brought to have same set aside, unless there are circumstances, in connection with the matter, not mentioned in your communication to us.

MRS. E. S., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man or woman, leaving no will, and leaving no surviving husband, wife, child or descendant and no father, the whole estate would go to the mother to the exclusion of brothers and sisters. The decedent's estate would include any vested interest in another estate, even though such other estate was still unsettled at the time of decedent's death.

E. A., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that if you sell your property and turn the proceeds of sale over to your husband to pay for property standing in his name, such money will become the property of your husband and would not go back to your children upon your death, but would continue the property of your husband, and upon his death would be disposed of according to the terms of his will, or go to his heirs-at-law and next of kin, in case he leaves no will.

MRS. J. L., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a stepchild has no rights of inheritance from his or her stepfather's estate unless some provision is made for such child by the will of the stepfather.

W. Z. M., Colorado.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the estate of an intestate descends to the surviving wife or husband where no children or descendants of children are left by such intestate; but in case a child, children or descendants of a child or children are left by such intestate, then one half of the estate goes to the surviving wife or husband and the other half to such child or children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

P. N., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your neighbor had a legal right to remove the limbs of his peach tree overhanging your property.

MRS. C. B. V., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of your husband, leaving no child or descendant, and leaving no will, you would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, the remainder going to his parents, brothers and sisters or their descendants, depending upon who is left; we think it will be necessary for your husband to leave a will in your favor if he desires you to receive the entire property.

MRS. G. T., Montana.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that it is necessary for the wife to join her husband in signing a deed or mortgage of his real estate in order to bar her right of dower in his real estate.

E. E. J.—We are of the opinion that the remarriage of either the man or woman you mention, during the lifetime of a husband or wife from whom they are not divorced, and in case the prior marriage has not been legally annulled, would be a bigamous and illegal marriage and would subject the man or woman who contracted such illegal marriage to punishment for such act.

MRS. H. H., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your husband, if he left no will, his homestead descended to you for life with remainder over to his children, the issue of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

MRS. E. M., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of your son-in-law, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, his whole estate, subject to the payment of his debts and the expenses of administration, descended to his widow, and that upon her subsequent death, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, her estate would go to her father and mother in equal shares, or, if but one survives, then to such survivor; we think any just claims against your son-in-law's estate would be entitled to a priority to your claim by inheritance from your daughter.

MRS. L. C., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property acquired by the husband and wife during marriage by onerous title is considered the common or community property, and during the marriage may be disposed of by the husband without the consent of the wife, and upon the death of either party, such of the community property as is not disposed of, goes one half to the survivor and the remainder to the child or children of the deceased, unless otherwise disposed of by the will of the deceased. We think the property of an insane person would be subject to the expense of the care and maintenance of such person and would be administered by the person appointed by the proper court for that purpose.

The foliage of stone fruits, as cherry, plum, and peach, is on the whole quite tender, and the arsenical sprays should be employed with caution. Arsenate of lead is the least likely to do harm, though more than two applications, especially to peach, may cause shotholing and dropping of leaves, and burning of fruit.

These Funny New Yorkers

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

FOLLOWING the fortunes of the Bixby family, whom I met shortly after coming to New York, was like coasting down hill, with an apartment with a liveried footman at the top and the most squalid home in the Bronx at the bottom, and every move made with an optimism that would make a joy ride out of a funeral procession.

He was an inventor, which explains much. Or, rather, leaves nothing to be explained. He was always hopeful today because of the fortune he was to make tomorrow. He was cursed with hope; so was his wife. They had more hope than sense, and this was the reason they were so very happy. Indeed they were so happy they put Pollyanna, Trotty Veck and all the other apostles of joy out of the running.

They had reached the lowest depths of poverty when his father died out in Iowa, and left Mr. Bixby four hundred dollars. The senior Bixby could not have chosen a more fitting time to Go Hence; even Mrs. Bixby admitted it when I went out to congratulate her on receiving the money. "He was deaf and blind and his mind had failed," she said, "and we needed the money so badly I think we would be hypocrites to mourn." Her husband, she said, agreed with her. "He had gone," she said, "up in the country where he had learned he could buy a small piece of ground for two hundred dollars, and the family would move on it at once.

I congratulated her, for living in New York is very high, and six mouths to feed had been a hard problem even for two who were cursed with hope. "And just think," I added, "you will have two hundred dollars left for putting up a little home."

She looked embarrassed. Then, laughing, she replied:

"But we haven't the two hundred dollars left. Mr. Bixby bought an automobile with it, and said you were to stay and go riding with us tonight."

I was stunned. For a moment I imagined I dreamed it. Then, knowing their hopeful dispositions, I realized that I was wide awake, and it was true. I stayed. I had that evening the first joy ride in my career.

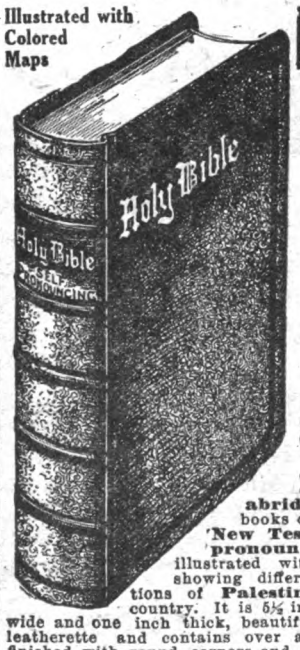
The automobile was a second-hand Ford that had seen hard service and showed it. There were five of us, counting the baby, in the back seat, and two in the front, and I thought when the engine began to work it would shake all the wood-work loose. Every part of the car was trying to shake loose from some other part, and we sounded as we moved like a milk-wagon full of empty cans with firecrackers going off under the horse's feet. We shook, we rattled, we squeaked, we banged; I thought that there was no noise we did not make until Mr. Bixby squeezed the siren. He evidently hurt it, for the blast it let forth sounded like cats at midnight, a bag of banshees and a menagerie at feeding time. After that it became a contest between the box-work and the siren as to which could make the greater noise, with the siren a few laps ahead.

He squeezed it every time he saw a cat crossing the road or lying peacefully dozing in a window. He squeezed it half way across every block for the next crossing, and men shrank back in fear at the sound, women turned pale, and nurses grabbed up their charges and fled. A mounted policeman gave chase, and just as he neared us Mr. Bixby saw another cat, and being very humane, squeezed the siren for it to get out of the way and save all of its lives. The policeman's horse heard the siren; they say it is impossible to frighten a New York horse, but this horse reared, plunged, turned, and ran away.

Mrs. Bixby's face would have been a model for a painter. Such supreme bliss was never before pictured before on a human countenance. "Isn't it grand?" she said loudly above the noises; "Isn't it grand? We intend to take you often."

Mr. Bixby turned in to a curb. "We will all have to get out here," he said, "and you folks can take a street car home. I can't take you home for I haven't learned how to turn around."

My last view of the car was as the center of an idolizing group of six. I wondered as I waved good by to them from the steps of a street car when and under what circumstances I would see this happy family again.



Three weeks later she called on me. "We sold the car," she said. "Why, do you know they had the nerve at the garage to say it needed repairing, and we couldn't afford that. A nice car like that! The idea!"

She sniffed her disdain. "But that is not what I have come for. I have come to ask you to lend me five dollars. We haven't a cent in the house."

their hands on and started a revolutionary campaign against the whole world. Then flannel-headed idiots wonder why we are trying to localize by means of a blockade, etc., this epidemic of mental madness and degeneracy and keep these red devils from spewing themselves all over creation!!! You will notice that Germany, which is largely responsible for this welter of blood and madness, ordered Noske with machine guns, flame throwers and poison gas to put down symptoms of the disease when it displayed itself in little old Germany. The German knew his business. Pity we don't know ours half so well. He didn't want any of the poison he had prepared for the rest of the world. Wise old Fritz. If I had been alive during the French Revolution, I should certainly have objected to the needless bloodshed, the horrible butcheries and the vile attitude of the revolutionaries towards all religion, an attitude which is adopted in Russia by all who embrace Bolshevism. These mad and unnecessary excesses made way for the dictatorship of Napoleon and the reaction which followed. France, after all, had to have her emperors back again. We know that good came out of that revolution, but it did not come from murder and bloodshed; it came from new ideas of man's relationship to the state and his fellow-man, and those ideas which would have saved France endless bloodshed and misery were deep rooted in the British mind hundreds of years before the French had dreamed of them. If blood is your argument, it may interest you to know that Lord Robert Cecil recently stated that Great Britain had gained more liberty by one peaceful Bill of Rights than France had by three revolutions. That shows the difference between the Latin and the Anglo-Saxon temperament, and proves we can have reform without violence, progress without destruction. Our institutions provide for peaceful reforms. God help those who attempt by violence to attain their ends. Socialists have tried colonizing and every attempt has been a tragic failure. The socialist ideal is international; the socialist must have the whole world or nothing to carry out his schemes, and it is going to be nothing unless you can breed a race of humans that are not only human, but angelic. The sane socialist who wanted a Christ world, left the movement in disgust. Nationalism was his stay but universal fraternity was his hope. The God-hating Bolshevists want only a jazz world created at other people's expense, with the usual accessories of bloodshed, degeneracy, free love and lunacy, of which you can get lurid examples in our own country without going to Russia. These fanatics want to run things to hades, but they won't be allowed to do it here. P. S. Yes, violent revolutions bring about changes and reactions. You dump one set of tyrants and get another set fifty times worse but you never get liberty or democracy. The poor man grabs his bit of land and the Red Guards steal his crops and murder him. Sense, soap, right living, right thinking, kindness and love of God are man's only hope. Load up on these—especially the soap—and you'll need no bloody revolutions.

Are You A Woman Who Wants To Become A Better Cook—A Better Housekeeper?

IF so, you need this new book just published by COMFORT.

It is, we believe, the most valuable, most helpful book for the American housewife ever written. For it will help any woman to become a better cook and a better housekeeper—and at a saving of money almost unbelievable in these days of high prices.

Its scores upon scores of tried and proven recipes call for only the most common, inexpensive ingredients, yet you will find them to be the most wholesome, appetizing, satisfying dishes ever eaten in your home. No grandmother of olden days ever made more delicious bread, pies, cakes and puddings than you can make with the aid of these prize-winning, money-saving recipes—to say nothing of the waffles and muffins, turnovers and puffs, cookies and doughnuts, tarts and all kinds of toothsome pastry.

The secret of correct mixing proportions, with tables of cooking weights and measures, are described, as are also the right way to use eggs in cooking and the best methods of cooking and serving meat, fish, chicken, and all kinds of vegetables.

There are pages of special cooking hints—instructions on how to plan and prepare an economical breakfast, dinner and supper for the average family—what to cook for the sick—Christmas cakes and candies—Easter luncheons—how to keep food from spoiling in any weather—how to eliminate food waste by making use of "left-overs"—and other bits of helpful advice all contributed by women who are expert cooks and know what they are talking about. But this book is More Than A Cook Book!

In it you will also find countless household hints and suggestions that will enable you to make, with your own hands, and at practically no expense, many new labor-saving devices for the kitchen and articles of needed furniture and decorative furnishings—you will learn how to have an efficient kitchen—how to save fuel, oil and gas—to care for, clean and conserve clothing and household utensils—to take "short cuts" in washing, housecleaning and the other hundred and one housewifely duties in the home.

It also explains how to prepare and can all kinds of meats, vegetables and fruits by steam pressure—how to can and preserve fruit in season, with special recipes for jam, jellies, etc., etc.,—how to dry vegetables and fruit—how to salt, pickle and ferment green vegetables for winter use.

Then there are pages devoted to home and the care, culture and housing of winter plants and winter blooming bulbs, all of which are of unusual interest and fascination to the wife and mother, while for the men folks there are articles on the use of paint, and light and power plants.

There is still more in this great book but lack of space prevents a further description. Let us send you a copy—it will cost you nothing if you accept our free offer below. It is a handsome book of 192 pages, 6 inches by 8½ inches in size, and many illustrations, printed on fine paper, durably bound, with illustrated colored covers.

Every State Has Its Gems

WHAT precious stones are found in your state? You may be surprised to know that there are precious or semi-precious gems in every state in the Union, and another surprising thing about this is that North Carolina has the greatest variety, seventeen different sorts, while West Virginia has the fewest—only one. That one is the somewhat common rock crystal, so common that it is not generally listed even as a semi-precious stone.

Here is an alphabetical list of states and the precious and semi-precious stones to be found in them:

Millet from Ashes

By Carol C. Crain.

THE Czechs and Slovaks of northern Austria have dreamed of national liberty ever since their overthrow on the Field of the Blackbirds in 1389. When Russia was one of the allies, immense numbers of these rebellious Austrian subjects surrendered at every opportunity. When Russia backslid, the prisoners arrayed themselves against German influences and became the nucleus which resulted in the re-establishment of the eastern battle front.

They are a queer people, perhaps the best fighters of the old world. They have dozens of quaint customs, of which their wedding ceremony is one of the oddest. The matchmaker or procurator is a leading figure. It is he who takes the hopeful bridegroom to the sweetheart's home and there admits:

"Well-beloved neighbor, the bridegroom has too little. He has not seen the bride. If she is anywhere near or in the house, I will go and fetch her."

Where is the lady? Safely hidden behind the big stove or concealed in drapery. But a woman is found and brought forward; she claims to be the bride and asserts he has deceived her. This diversion amuses the watchers, and presently the true bride emerges from her concealment.

The youth sends the girl a present, which may be a silver wedding ring, a three-keyed girdle, a fur cap or a prayer book. She reciprocates with a beautiful gold-threaded shirt and a wedding ring. The wedding breakfast is given at the bride's home and each guest takes away a handkerchief as a souvenir.

At this time the procurator asks for the bride. The father hesitates and declares he must think the matter over. As the procurator is insistent, the old man doubts the wisdom of surrendering his daughter. The third request for his daughter brings the desired answer of "All in God's name."

The ceremony occurs at the village church with the groom wearing a crown of tinsel and the bride one of silver wire decorated with black velvet and pink ribbons. The young wife accompanies the husband to meet her mother-in-law, who extends a welcome with a cup of wine or coffee. The bride drinks and hurls the emptied glass over her shoulder; if it falls without breaking, good luck will follow the newly-weds.

The pair receive two slices of bread as an omen that they may never suffer dire want and to keep the bread she bakes from souring. Time brings mold upon the bread; if it first appears upon the husband's slice, it is thought he will die first.

During the meal that follows the ceremony the matchmaker places a mixture of ashes and millet seed before the bride; if she does a thorough job of picking them out, the husband knows he has a frugal wife.

RUPTURED? TRY THIS FREE

Wonderful Invention Sent on 30 Days' Trial Before You Pay.

Simply send me your name and I will send you my new copyrighted rupture book and measurement blank. When you return the blank I will send you my new invention for rupture. When it arrives put it on and wear it. Put it to every test you can think of. The harder the test the better you will like it. You will wonder how you ever got along with the old style cruel spring trusses or belts with leg straps of torture. Your own good, common sense and your own doctor will tell you it is the only way in which you can ever expect a cure. After wearing it 30 days if it is not entirely satisfactory in every way—if it is not easy and comfortable—if you cannot actually see your rupture getting better and if not convinced that a cure is merely a question of time—just return it and you are out nothing. Any rupture appliance that is sent on 30 days' trial before you pay is worth giving a trial. Why not tell your ruptured friends of this great offer?

Send Only Three Subscriptions For This Cut Glass Sugar and Creamer—Or Two Subscriptions For The Pickle Dish Or Spoon Tray!

WE want to ask our women readers—did you ever see or hear of a more remarkable offer?

Just think of the small number of subscriptions required to earn any one or all of these beautiful cut glass pieces.

And it is real cut glass—of good weight and thickness—clear, brilliant, crystal glass, exquisitely hand cut in a new and beautiful design. Each piece is full size with the same handsome floral pattern that twines completely around the outside in graceful curves, while on the bottom of each piece is a heavily cut, many-pointed star. The rim of both sugar and creamer is deeply notched.

Do you wonder how we can make this offer? A certain factory, realizing that we shall probably use thousands of these sets, has made us an unusually low price. That's the whole story. And the result is we can give you your choice of this rich genuine cut glass absolutely free in return for the easiest half hour's work you ever did.

We Prepay Charges And Positively Guarantee Safe Delivery

Any or all of these pieces can be safely mailed by parcel post. We pay all postage and guarantee safe delivery to your home. If by chance a piece should become broken (something that rarely happens) we will replace it free of charge.

We know that every woman that receives one or more of these rich cut glass pieces will be amazed and delighted with the bargain she has obtained. It is easily the greatest value in a premium that we have ever been able to offer. We will give you your choice of the Sugar and Creamer, or the Pickle Dish, or the Spoon Tray absolutely free on the terms of the following special Club Offers. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the Sugar and Creamer by prepaid insured parcel post. (Premium No. 8883). Or for two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you your choice of either the Pickle Dish (Premium No. 9402), or the Spoon Tray (Premium No. 9412). Or we will send you the complete set of all four pieces free and prepaid for a club of seven one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each. (Premium No. 7457).

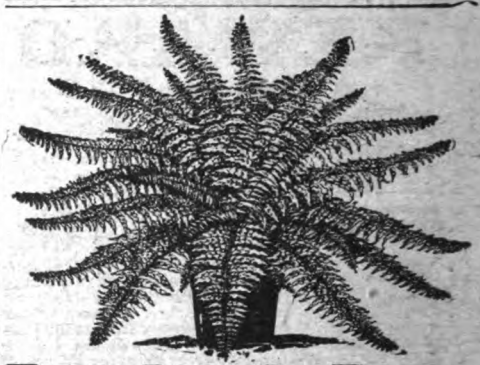
26-Piece Table Set



Yours Prepaid For A Club Of Seven

WE have in the past made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7397.

If any of them fail to grow, we will cheerfully replace them free of charge. We are able to illustrate only one variety, "The Roosevelt," but remember you get all four ferns free on this offer.

Given To You. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you the above described collection of four beautiful ferns free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 6112.

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled Rings by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

Four Wheel Chairs in December

535 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The four December wheel chairs go to the Soldiers' Friend Club, Galesburg, Ill., 150; James L. Nichols, Coweta, Okla., 149; Harold Johnson, Forest Hill, La., 104; Arthur W. Mahaffey, R. 2, Brevard, N. C., 86.

The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them, except that the 104 for Harold Johnson includes cash and subscriptions making total equivalent to 104 subscriptions for him.

The Soldiers' Friend Club consists of sixteen little girls ranging in age from seven to fourteen years and was organized by Laura Gleason in June, 1918 to aid in war work. Through entertainments given by the Club and by the sale of articles made by the members the little girls raised and turned over to the Galesburg Red Cross chapter more than a hundred dollars for the benefit of the soldiers, as told in the Sisters' Corner in September COMFORT where we also printed a group picture of the Club members. Since the war work ended with the demobilizing of the National Army the Soldiers' Friend Club has turned its activities to aiding local charities. Its latest achievement was the procuring of 150 COMFORT subscriptions and thereby obtaining a COMFORT wheel chair for use of the Visiting Nurse Association. The chair bears a brass plate on which is engraved "COMFORT Chair by Soldiers' Friend Club." Every community has its cripples and invalids in need of wheel chairs, and they could all be supplied with COMFORT wheel chairs if the people generally were as public spirited as these little girls of the Soldiers' Friend Club.

James L. Nichols, age 73, has been helpless from his hips down since last July, caused by paralysis and sciatic rheumatism. His wife takes care of him as his children are all married and have families. Mrs. John Burress, who has been active in getting subscriptions for his chair, writes: "We want to surprise him with his chair, hoping it will cheer him up so he will gain his strength again."

Harold Johnson, age 8, has never walked, due to the effect of infantile paralysis when a baby. He is one of a large family of children and his parents are poor. The wheel chair will be a blessing to him and his mother.

Arthur W. Mahaffey, age 26, has been a cripple all his life and has no use of his legs. He is dependent on his aged father for support.

The friends of Bernard Beadle will be pleased to see the accompanying picture of him enjoying his COMFORT wheel chair. His mother's letter explains delay in furnishing the photo.

Why not follow the example of the Soldiers' Friend Club and that of some other local organizations that have procured COMFORT wheel chairs for community use?

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Thankful for Bernard Beadle's Wheel Chair

Osgood, Ind.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I enclose a picture of Bernard in his wheel chair for which I am very thankful. I should have sent you a picture of him some time ago but owing to his nervousness could never before obtain a good one. Respectfully yours, (Mrs.) Grace Beadle.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN.

America First—the Destiny of Our Country Must Not Be Subject to Foreign Control

PRESUMABLY all our readers know that disagreement as to the expediency of joining the League of Nations on the terms prescribed in the proposed peace treaty is the obstacle that thus far has prevented ratification of the treaty by the U. S. Senate. But the document itself is so lengthy and complicated, and the issue has been so befogged by abstruse arguments and grandiloquent oratory that comparatively few people understand the real meaning of the League of Nations proposition and the menace to our country involved in accepting it in its entirety. Without discussing in detail the various intricacies of the treaty I will try to make clear a few salient points of vital interest which justify the persistent stand of the majority of our senators for a modification of the League of Nations program to the extent necessary to safeguard the rights, interests and independence of the United States.

These patriotic senators have been scandalously abused and unjustly charged by the so-called League of Peace advocates with having blocked the ratification of the treaty, although in fact the accusers are wholly responsible for the situation. It takes a two-thirds majority of the Senate to ratify a treaty. Last November a substantial majority, though less than two-thirds, of the senators voted to ratify the treaty, including acceptance of the League of Nations, but subject to certain modifications in the form of reservations in the interest, as stated, of the United States. The only reason why the peace treaty failed of ratification at that time was that a stubborn minority demanded acceptance of the European made treaty without the slightest change and voted solidly against the Americanized form. But it is expected that the minority will yield enough to allow the treaty to be ratified on an Americanized basis.

America First

IT should be distinctly understood that the majority senators, by their insistence that our acceptance of the League of Nations feature of the peace treaty be accompanied by, and conditioned on, reservations necessary to preserve the rights, interests and, above all, the independence of the United States, are pursuing the wise policy advised by Washington and advocated and carried on by Monroe, Lincoln, Grant and Roosevelt—five great champions of sturdy Americanism, of the policy of America First, of preserving our national independence by avoiding entanglement in foreign alliances, of keeping out of all wars in which our national honor or national rights are not menaced, of stoutly maintaining and defending our national rights and honor, of protecting our own vital interests by protecting the free nations of North and South America from aggression or conquest by European or Asiatic Powers—in short the policy of minding our own business on this side of the water and insisting that Europe and Asia shall mind theirs. Hitherto this has been the settled policy of our Government and has made our country great, powerful, prosperous and respected. The entrance of the United States into World War was not in any sense a departure from this policy. Through the first two years and eight months of the war our country remained neutral, until Germany's many dastardly attacks and wanton destruction of the lives and property of our citizens on land and sea compelled us to fight in defense of our national rights and honor; and even then we did not form any alliance although, of course, we joined forces with Germany's enemies as the most effective means to victory.

Senate's Americanizing Reservations

THE compass of this editorial does not admit of mention of all the peace treaty's snares and pitfalls that the reservations of the majority senators are designed to save our country from falling into; but the following samples will suffice to demonstrate how suicidal it would be for the United States to accept the League of Nations proposition unconditionally and without modification of such of its terms as are inimical to American interests. The League of Nations amounts to a sort of international super-government by the member nations for the purpose of exercising certain powers not only over the governments of its members but also over the whole world, and of enforcing obedience by war if necessary. It is specified in the peace treaty that Great Britian and her colonies shall have six votes while the United States is permitted only one vote in the governing body of the League. For the purpose of rectifying this gross inequality so far as American interests are concerned the majority senators demanded a reservation limiting the British Empire to one vote on all questions affecting the United States. Can you imagine any true American objecting to this reservation? And yet all the minority senators, except a very few, voted against it.

Other clauses of the treaty would, to a considerable extent, impair the independence of the United States by subjecting our country to foreign dictation not only in its international intercourse but even in the regulation and administration of its internal affairs. For instance, we could be required to submit to the judgment of a foreign board of arbitration as to our immigration laws, our Chinese exclusion act, the several State laws restricting or prohibiting foreign ownership of land, to which Japan so strenuously and impudently objects, and in fact almost any law that affects the interests of another nation or its citizens. The League is also authorized to limit the size of our army and navy.

The United States would be required to provide a military and naval force to be at the disposal of the League to enforce its rules, regulations, judgments and decrees against any disobedient nation; which means that we could be plunged into war, without the consent of Congress, at any time and in any part of the world to help settle a quarrel that in no way concerned us. This requirement of the peace treaty is in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States which confers on Congress the power and sole responsibility of declaring war.

The war has made over the map of Europe. Some of the old countries have gained territory at the expense of their neighbors, and a lot of little turbulent states have suddenly sprung into independent existence from the wreck of the Russian, Austrian and German empires. Since the armistice they have had some twenty wars, mostly over disputed boundaries, and many of them are still fighting. They are to be admitted to the League of Nations, and by the clause of the peace treaty which guarantees the present boundaries of the member nations our country would be embroiled in their quarrels. At the earnest solicitation of the United States and the Allies China entered the war against Germany; and what is her reward? Her Shantung province containing forty million Chinese—more than the entire population of France—is taken from her and given to Japan by the peace treaty. And the United States is asked to confirm this outrageous robbery. The majority of the senators refused to sanction it, and even the minority members, who voted in favor of the proposition for fear of offending Japan, had to acknowledge that it was wrong. Would you wish the Senate to accept this treaty without reservations in behalf of America on all these points? Let us see how Washington, Monroe, Lincoln, Grant and Roosevelt dealt with such propositions in their times.

Washington's Prophetic Warning

FORTY-FIVE years of Washington's life were devoted to the service of his country, the larger part spent in fighting its battles in the French and Indian wars and in the war for Independence. He was reluctant to hold public office, loved peace and abhorred war, but never hesitated to lead in a just war. On retiring from the presidency, which closed his long public career, Washington issued his "Farewell Address to the American People" advising them as to the policies to be pursued for the welfare of the nation. The test of time has shown it to be a masterpiece of prophetic wisdom. As to avoiding war by keeping out of entangling foreign alliances he admonished:

"The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible.* Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.* Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice? It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world;*"

The Monroe Doctrine

WE have prospered by minding our own business. Later it became necessary for President Monroe to proclaim, as the corollary of Washington's proposition, that Europe must mind her business by not meddling with the affairs of the independent nations of North and South America. Brazil was a former colony of Portugal while all the other South American nations were former colonies of Spain, but all had gained their independence prior to 1823 when Spain asked the then existing league of European nations, known as the Holy Alliance, to assist her and Portugal to reconquer their lost American colonies. It was to prevent this threatened aggression that President Monroe announced it to be the policy of the United States not to tolerate the conquest or colonization of any independent American country by a European power. This is the famous Monroe Doctrine which we have stoutly maintained ever since as the determined policy of America. As we were then a weak nation it is probable that the powerful Holy Alliance would have given little heed to President Monroe's warning if Great Britain had not deemed it advantageous to her commercial interests to support our side of the controversy.

The Monroe Doctrine has been the means of preserving the other American republics from annihilation by European powers, but the fundamental reason why we would go to war, if necessary, to enforce it is that European aggression and conquest once begun on the American continent would sooner or later menace our own peace and security. A further expansion of the Monroe Doctrine was proclaimed by subsequent Presidents, notably by President Grant, to the effect that such European nations as have American colonies shall not be allowed to sell, swap or otherwise dispose of them except to the United States, or to make them free and independent. This policy blocked Germany's efforts to buy the Danish West Indies, which were afterwards bought by our Government and renamed the Virgin Islands.

Louis Napoleon's Defiance of the Monroe Doctrine Led to His Downfall

DURING our Civil War Mexico was in about the same condition of anarchy as at present. At that time Louis Napoleon was emperor of France, and, being ambitious to achieve some conquest in imitation of the exploits of his uncle, the great Napoleon, took

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

"Who is sick here, miss?"

"Sing to me please—sing to me about the jasper walls and gates of pearl."

"Do not feel that you must decide the matter to night, Violet."

Suddenly he gathered her slight form in his arms, and leaped into the carriage.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

On a car, going up a steep hill, leading to the Zoological Gardens of Cincinnati, is Violet Draper Huntington. Opposite her sits Wallace Richardson. Nearly at the top of the hill, something beneath the car breaks. Wallace seizes Violet's hands and locking them behind his neck commands her to cling. The car crashes down, burying all the passengers beneath the ruins. They are the only two alive and hurried to Wallace Richardson's home, are cared for by his mother. Mrs. Mencke, Violet's sister provides a nurse and leaves orders for Violet to see no one. The nurse out for a walk, Violet goes to the adjoining room to meet Wallace and thank him for the life saved. As they become more friendly, Wallace realizes his danger and Violet is hopelessly in love. Violet asks Wallace to come with his mother to see her. Mrs. Mencke takes Violet to Saratoga for two months, then to Cincinnati, and home. The following day, picking up a paper, Violet reads of Mrs. Richardson's death. She goes to the Richardsons' house and expresses her sympathy to Wallace, who unconsciously calls her my darling, and asks her forgiveness. As she whispers, "I am glad," he knows she is all his own. Returning home, her sister demands where she has been, and learning it was at Mrs. Richardson's funeral, that she rides in the carriage with Wallace and Mrs. Dent, Mrs. Mencke denounces it as questionable and that she must drop him for all time. Wallace, calling upon Violet, Mr. and Mrs. Mencke return and she introduces him and admits he is her promised husband. She overhears Belle's and her husband's scheme to place her in a convent. Mrs. Mencke, proposing a trip to Montreal, Violet refuses to go, and Mrs. Mencke takes Mrs. Hawley, who is to sail for Europe and chaperone Nellie Bailey, into her confidence and requests her to induce Violet to join them. Violet makes ready for the proposed trip and Wallace is at the steamer to say good by. Vane Cameron and Ralph Henderson join Mr. and Mrs. Hawley's party and before the voyage is over Vane Cameron surrenders his heart to Violet. Mrs. Mencke schemes that no letters pass between Violet and Wallace and later, joining the party in Europe, gives her permission for Vane to win Violet. Failing to get Violet's consent, she produces a notice of Wallace Richardson's death, which throws Violet into a severe sickness, leaving her sad and heartbroken. Vane Cameron, receiving an encouraging letter from Mrs. Mencke, appears, and tells Violet the wish nearest his heart is to make her his wife. Violet confesses to Vane her love for Wallace Richardson, her sister's opposition, concealing nothing. Knowing she is unhappy from causes other than Wallace's death, Vane urges her to allow him to give her his name, to shield her from sorrow and care. Violet, afraid to yield, and hesitating, faints. Ringing a bell, Mrs. Mencke enters. Recovering consciousness, Violet questions did she promise, and being assured by her sister that she has, she faints again. Mrs. Mencke informs Lord Cameron that Violet acknowledges the engagement, and later she consents to what he thinks best, but with many misgivings. Mrs. Mencke, entering Violet's room, finds the bed made and the room in order and no trace discovered of her. Four weeks later, Lord Cameron, returning from a fruitless search, sees a group near a cliff and the body of a woman upon the beach, clad in dark grey suit with bands of blue silk. Believing it is Violet, Lord Cameron selects a spot near the sea. The next day a stranger appears and requests to meet the woman reported to have married Lord Cameron. Being questioned by the Menckes his right, he produces the marriage certificate and Vane Cameron confirms it by Violet's admission of it to him, the treatment received, her disappearance and later the finding of her body by drowning and the burial. Wallace falls unconscious and Lady Cameron and Vane remain with Wallace through a severe illness, after which he returns to New York, building up a fine business. In the meanwhile, Wilhelm Mencke squanders all at the gaming table and Mrs. Mencke goes to Cincinnati from which place she suddenly disappears. Violet comes to New York, securing a position as governess for Bertha Lawrence, who is partially blind and possessed of a strong will. She wins her affections, Mr. Lawrence treating her as a member of the family, and alone with himself determines to win Violet. Wilhelm Mencke secures Violet's address and learns that Wallace Richardson is in the city. Calling upon him and desiring to raise money, he offers Violet's jewelry for two thousand dollars. Wallace objects. As the husband of Violet, he is the legal heir and will give a sum which may be named as their value and fifty dollars. Jonas Huntington dies, leaving a fortune to his niece, Violet Huntington. She, supposed to be dead, the nearest heir is Mrs. Wilhelm Mencke, for whom search is being made.

CHAPTER XXVI.

BERTHA IS CALLED AWAY.

WILHELM Mencke, after reading the foregoing account over the second time, sat for a long time absorbed in thought, a cunning and malicious gleam in his small eyes, as if some deep and crafty plot were taking root in his brain.

"I must do it!" he muttered, at length. "I must get hold of Violet—get her into my power, and away from New York, where she is continually liable to meet that ——architect. Then I must find Belle. Where can the jade have been all this time? It is absolutely necessary that I find her, for she is—ahem! yes, of course, she is the next of kin; and if we manage things cleverly we can get hold of this handsome pile that Jonas Huntington spent all his life in hoarding, and hold up our heads once more. It is evident that Belle isn't in Cincinnati, or she would have seen the advertisements and have put in her own claim before this—the old girl isn't at all backward, where money is concerned, any more than I am. I can't believe she has remained in London all these months, for she could have had but precious little money, and she'd be likely to want to get back to her own country, if she had herself to take care of."

Once more he dropped into deep thought, but after a time began to soliloquize again.

"I wonder if it would be of any use for me to advertise in the New York papers for her," he mused. "It would be queer if she should be hiding here, as well as the rest of us, and yet there isn't a better place to lose one's self in, take the world over. I've half a mind to try it, for find her I must, or I can never get the handling of that fortune."

The next day there appeared in three of the morning papers a personal to this effect:

WANTED.—To learn the whereabouts of Mrs. B—— M——, formerly of Cincinnati. She will learn of something to her advantage if she will confer with W. M., No. 90 —— Street, New York City.

This advertisement was printed in each paper twice a week during the next two months, but without producing the desired information, consequently the crafty plotter could not carry out his schemes, and Jonas Huntington's great fortune still remained in the hands of the Cincinnati lawyer, Ralph Middleton.

Meantime, however, Wilhelm Mencke was on the alert about other matters.

He haunted the vicinity of No. —— Fifth Avenue, trying to learn something of Violet's movements, and to carry out the plot which he had laid for her unwary feet.

Once or twice he saw her go out to ride with Bertha and her father, but after that he did not get another glimpse of her for long weeks, while every day he saw a doctor's carriage stand for half an hour or more before the palatial residence of the wealthy banker, and he began to think that Violet herself might be dangerously ill.

One evening just at dusk, after a long watch in the vicinity, he accosted a servant coming out of the basement door, and, raising his hat politely, he inquired:

"Who is sick here, miss? I see a doctor's team here every day as I pass from my work."

"The young lady of the house, sir," responded the girl, regarding him wonderingly.

"What, the poor, pretty little thing whose eyes are bad?" he asked, in a tone of affected sympathy.

"Yes," the girl said, tears springing to her own eyes, for, since Violet had been in the house, Bertha had grown to be a different girl, and the servants all loved her now.

"What is the matter?" Vilhelm Mencke asked, secretly disappointed to learn that it was not Violet who was sick, for it would be much easier to get possession of the fortune that had been recently willed to her if she were out of the way.

"She had a bad fall, sir, a while ago. The doctor says her spine is fractured in two places, and she'll never be well again," the girl explained.

"That is bad enough, but not so bad as if there wasn't plenty of money and good friends to look after her," the man returned.

"That is true, sir," said the girl, growing communicative under the interest which her companion manifested, "and she does have the best of care and attention. Miss Huntington, the governess, is just beautiful with her—so kind and gentle, and Miss Bertha can't bear to have her out of her sight a minute."

"That is very nice of the young lady, to be sure; but does she stay with her the whole time?" inquired Mr. Mencke, who desired to post himself thoroughly regarding Violet's movements.

"Mostly—except nights."

"She'll be getting sick herself. Doesn't she go out to get the air at all?"

"Well, for half an hour or so, about noon, when the master makes her go with him."

Ah! this explained why Wilhelm Mencke had never seen her out.

His dinner hour was at twelve, and, as that meal was the most important one of the day to him, he was always busily engaged when Violet took her airing.

He resolved to govern himself accordingly after this; though, if Mr. Lawrence always accompanied Violet, he feared he would be unable to accomplish his purpose.

"Your master must be a very kind man to take such an interest in the governess," he slyly remarked.

"Law! Next to Bertha, he sets his eyes by her. There's nothing he wouldn't do for her; and"—with a significant laugh and toss of her trim head, for the girl dearly loved to gossip if she could get any one to listen to her—"there's a bet between me and the coachman—a pair of new bracelets against a new hat—that she'll be the mistress here yet."

Wilhelm Mencke started.

He had not thought of anything like that happening in connection with Violet; but now it suddenly occurred to him that, if the banker had fallen in love with her, he might turn this fact to his own advantage also.

If the fair governess should happen to disappear, in some mysterious way, the wealthy man might offer a handsome reward for tidings of her, and if he was shrewd he might line his pockets with an extra amount of gold.

He had now learned all he cared to, for the present, and so, after paying the girl a compliment or two, in return for her volubility, he bade her good evening and sauntered away.

* * * * * * * * *

It was true that Bertha had had a terrible fall and now lay at the point of death.

A day or two after that happy afternoon at the opera, she was going down stairs, singing, as happy as a bird, when one of the rods which held the carpet in place—having become loosened from its socket—suddenly flew out and tripped her, causing her to fall nearly the whole length of the staircase.

She was unconscious when her father, who had heard the fall and sprung from his library to her aid, picked her up and carried her to her room.

The physician, on his arrival, made a careful examination, but could not at that time decide just how serious her injuries were. Later, after a consultation with another surgeon, he declared that her spine was fractured in two places, and that she could never recover from the injury—in all probability she would not live more than a few weeks.

The poor child's sufferings were terrible, but she was a patient little thing, and only when exhausted nature could bear no more did she complain of her hard lot.

Violet was with her continually, and did much to cheer and comfort her, while she did not spare herself in any way in her efforts to relieve her pain.

"How good you are to me, Miss Huntington," Bertha remarked, affectionately, one day, when she had had a longer interval of ease than usual.

"And why should I not be, dear?" Violet asked. "I am sure I love you dearly, and would do anything in the world to spare you suffering."

And she emphasized the assertion with a fond kiss upon the girl's pale brow.

"I almost wonder that you do love me," Bertha said, with a sigh.

"Why, my dear child?"

"Because I was so naughty and disagreeable when you first came here."

"But that was a long, long time ago, darling, and I never think of it—you have grown to seem like a dear little sister to me."

"Have I?" cried the child, eagerly, her wan face brightening. "How I wish I could always have had you, dear Miss Huntington. I know I should have been a much better girl, but I am glad that I have had you even for a little while."

"I am glad, too, Bertha, and I hope we are going to enjoy each other's companionship for a long while to come," Violet answered, with a sudden heart sinking at that last remark.

Bertha lay quietly thinking for several moments, then she asked gravely, almost appealingly:

"Miss Huntington, do you believe that little girls who are blind here on earth will see in heaven?"

A shock of pain went quivering through all Violet's nerves at this significant question; but she answered as if there was nothing unusual about it:

"Why of course I do, dear; whatever of ill we may have been afflicted with in this life all will be removed in the future world."

"What makes you think so?" Bertha inquired, with tremulous eagerness.

"Don't you remember, Bertha, that beautiful promise in Revelations? 'There shall be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away.'" Violet returned, a deep tenderness in her tones.

"Those are very comforting words, aren't they?" said Bertha, a glad light illuminating her face, "and I believe them, too, besides a good many other things that you have read to me. It will be very beautiful to be able to see everything clearly and plainly, and never have to grieve any more because you are not quite sure that you know just how those you love look. I think," she went on, with a tender smile on her lips, "that I am going to see and know mamma very soon. I'm glad that I'm going, for I do so long to have my poor eyes opened. You don't know how I have longed, when I have been sitting at the window and knew that papa was on his way home, that I could see him a great distance away and watch him as he came nearer; but," with a heavy sigh, "I could never tell that he was near until I could hear his step."

Violet was so overcome to hear the child talk thus that she could make no reply—she knew that she should burst into tears if she attempted to do so; she could only grasp the small hand that lay upon the counterpane, and fondle it tenderly.

"Do you know," the young girl rambled on, after another interval of silence, "that I never thought much about heaven, or of going there until you came here, Miss Huntington, and I never liked to hear any one read from the Bible, but somehow you made everything sound differently; it did not seem like the stiff Bible verses; but more like a story about beautiful places and things. I am glad now, that you would never begin lessons until you read in the Testament all those lovely things about the blind men, and those others whom Jesus healed. Do you suppose He will touch my eyes when I get to heaven? I think it would be very pleasant to feel His hand laid upon me, and then look up to see Him first of all."

Violet bent down to kiss the little invalid before replying.

"There is no doubt, darling, that you will see Him, for you know that He has told us that every eye shall see Him; while He is to be the light of the heavenly city," Violet whispered—she could not trust herself to speak aloud.

"Sing to me, please—sing to me about the 'jasper walls and gates of pearl,'" Bertha pleaded, turning wearily upon her pillow.

Sing! When her heart was nearly ready to burst with grief because her little charge was dying.

It seemed impossible, but calling all her will to her aid, she softly sang the hymn of which Bertha had grown very fond, and before she was through the child was quietly sleeping.

She never awoke again; the shock and injury of her fall, together with the suffering that followed it, had worn out her young life; her breath became fainter and fainter, and before morning she had gone peacefully and gently into a brighter sphere, where, with vision unimpaired, she would forever find delight in the beauty and brightness of that world prepared for those who have here learned to trust in the great Healer of men.

Mr. Lawrence felt as if he were heavily afflicted in thus losing his only child, and in such a sad way, too, and for a time he seemed almost inconsolable.

Had it not been for Violet in his time of trouble, he felt that he could not have borne it.

She proved a true comforter in every sense of the word, and was so thoughtful and helpful, that the whole household regarded her with deeper love and admiration than ever.

It was she who suggested many pleasant little things, connected with the last ceremonies for Bertha which no one else would have thought of, and which robbed the occasion of much of its gloom.

She asked Mr. Lawrence's permission to arrange the house as she chose, and he had told her to do just as she wished about everything.

She would not have the room darkened, as was the custom; she threw open every shutter, and let in all the sunlight possible, to make the rooms cheerful.

Then she spread a great white fur rug, upon which it had been Bertha's delight to lie, just under the arch, between the two statues which Mr. Lawrence had so recently purchased, and directed that the beautiful white casket containing their loved dead, should be placed upon it.

She scattered lovely flowers all about it, and upon the still form—not set pieces, but carelessly, as if a shower of fragrant blossoms had suddenly fallen upon and around the dear child.

She would have nothing but green and white about Bertha, but everywhere else there were spots of warm color and bright hues, and Mr. Lawrence afterward said that the sunlight, with this warmth and brightness, was infinitely comforting to him.

Violet forgot nothing. She sent a little note to the soprano of the choir, connected with the church which they were in the habit of attending—a Miss Humphrey, a lovely girl, as well as a beautiful singer—asking if she would arrange for some music during the service; and so sweet voices chanted a heavenly requiem above the still form, and the delightful strains lingered long in the memory of those who heard them.

Violet thought she had never listened to anything sweeter, and as she passed Miss Humphrey on her way out to the carriage, when all was over, she bent down to her with a sudden impulse, grasped the fair songstress' hand, and whispered, while her lovely eyes flashed a look of gratitude into hers:

"Thank you! Angel music could not have been sweeter—I shall never forget it."

Miss Humphrey pressed the hand clasping hers in mute and sympathetic response, thinking that she had never seen a lovelier face; but neither of them had a suspicion how they were to meet again, or how intimately their future lives were to be interwoven.

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

JUST when I was saying to myself, "Oh, dear, there's nothing new to write about," I opened a letter from one of the good sisters, Mrs. Gertie Pope, Alabama, and found therein the following poem which opened my eyes to the lovely "new" things of everyday life. Never again shall I say, "There is nothing new under the sun." It is too bad Mrs. Pope did not give the name of the writer so we could thank him or her for something good to think about.—Ed.

The Commonplace

"The smile upon a friendly face
Holds nothing that is commonplace.
It's fresh as sunlight and the dew
And through the years is ever new.
Though other joys grow cold and stale,
The charms of friendship never fail.

"Men weary of the world, they cry,
And I can only wonder why,
For every rising of the sun
Brings splendid things to look upon,
And every day we wake to view
The least of us is born anew.

"Who wearies of the friendly hand
That's waved to him across the land?
Who, when he opens wide his door,
Does not rejoice to hear once more
His neighbor's salutation gay
At the commencement of the day?

"Who is not glad that he can see
Day after day the self-same tree?
Who cannot turn his eyes on high
And find new splendors in the sky?
And who would stamp as commonplace
The beauty of a loved one's face?

"In all men are, in all they do,
There is a thrill that's ever new.
Despite the care and pain of strife,
There's no monotony to life.
Though nothing new exists, we're told,
The truth is, there is nothing old."

GALESBURG, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

We are all happy and enthusiastic since our picture appeared in the September number of COMFORT for we are daily receiving letters of thanks and encouragement from all over the United States, from returned soldiers of the late war and other interested parties. All letters received are read at our monthly meetings so every member may be able to enjoy them. We wish to express our thanks for the kind letters and also wish to say that we only tried to do our duty and feel that our sacrifice was very little beside the great sacrifice of our dear heroes who were over there, and we are glad we were able to give the assistance we did to the Red Cross.

We are enclosing a check and list of 150 subscribers for which we hope to receive a wheel chair which we are going to donate to our Visiting Nurse Association that has more calls for wheel chairs than can be furnished. The check also contains $1.85 as we are each giving a dime toward Uncle Charlie's Home Fund.

Wishing you all the best of luck, we remain,
THE SOLDIERS' FRIEND CLUB.

Greetings, Girls of the Soldiers' Friend Club.—We feel honored to have such loyal workers with us and are sure you deserved every bit of thanks and encouragement you received, and ever so much more.—Ed.

WEST VIRGINIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Three cheers for Verne Ellis! I was going to write a letter something like his but as he beat me to it I will send two dimes instead of one. Sisters, let's get up an excitement among ourselves like the menfolks do around election time and just see how many dimes we can send in for Uncle Charlie's Home Fund.

While writing this letter the gude mon came walking along and said, "Did you say you were going to send a dime to Uncle Charlie?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Well, I will send one, too." Then I asked Boy if he wanted to send a dime and he said "Yep," so that makes four.

I don't agree with Elizabeth Wagner about changing the name of COMFORT'S Sisters' Corner to COMFORT'S Friends' Corner. If the men want to write letters to our corner that's all right (provided they send a dime to Uncle Charlie).

I have always been a great admirer of Mrs. Wilkinson. She seems just like "one of us," and takes so much interest in all our troubles and pleasures. One sister says, "All in favor of Mrs. Wilkinson sending her picture, signify by a rising." I am standing on tiptoe.

With love and best wishes to everybody,
MEDDLESOME MATTIE.

Mattie.—I positively refuse to call you "Meddlesome". To say you regard me as one of you, is the very nicest thing you could say. That is what I try to be. Why shouldn't I take an interest in your troubles and pleasures? I'm just another woman with troubles and pleasures like yours. I haven't had as much sorrow in my life as some of you have, but maybe I've had more than some others. As for pleasures, I've found if we enjoy the simple pleasures, while we have them, and not look forward to something greater, that we get much more happiness out of life.—Ed.

COLORADO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you let me in just for a minute? I am not a subscriber but the Daddy of a subscriber.

I want to say in regard to the family money that what will work in one family might fail in another. In my case I tried them all and they all failed so we dissolved partnership. I am a firm believer in equal rights but, like charity, it begins at home. If there is any place that equal rights should be practiced

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

THE ready response to my request for recipes is very gratifying, for this month it was a regular shower of favorite recipes, from almost every State in the Union, and including everything from cider jelly (in spite of the 18th Amendment) to chocolate roll. Fussy indeed must be the person who cannot find something pleasing, as well as economical among the lot. My thanks to all who were kind enough to send these recipes. Here are some of them.—Ed.

VALENTINE CROQUETTES.—Two cups of finely chopped ham, two unbeaten raw eggs, two cups of bread-crumbs just moistened with cold water, seasoning of salt, pepper and powdered sage. Beat all together and if the mixture is too dry to handle, add a little cold water. Wet the hands and form mixture into heart shapes about an inch thick and roll in flour. Fry a rich brown in deep fat. Take piece of celery cut to form an arrow and press nearly upright in center of croquette.

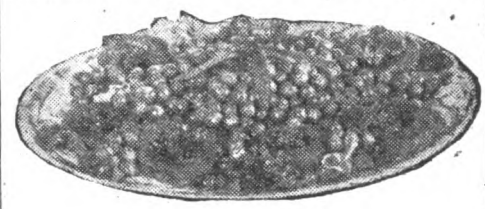
EGG TOAST.—Cut inch slices of stale bread into heart shapes, remove centers to correspond with outer edge, dip in cold milk and drain then in lightly beaten egg, and fry in the croquette fat.



CIDER JELLY.—Take two quarts of cider and let it come to a boil and stir in two quarts of sugar, gradually, until it thickens. Keep the juice hot and stir it until the sugar is all dissolved. Remove from stove and put into glasses.—ANOTHER YOUNG WIFE, Virginia.

CHOCOLATE ROLL.—Cream together three eggs, one cup of sugar, two tablespoons of butter and two tablespoons of milk. Mix one teaspoon of baking powder with one cup of flour. Stir both mixtures together and add one teaspoon of vanilla. Bake in a long tin. Turn on sugared paper and spread with chocolate filling and roll as you would a jelly roll.

FILLING.—Two squares of chocolate, melted, one half cup of sugar, one half cup of cream. Stir well and add one half teaspoon butter, two teaspoons cornstarch mixed with one half cup of milk. Stir constantly until the mixture boils, then beat until smooth when it is ready to spread on cake. This should be done while cake is warm.—MRS. OLIVE HESTON, Highland, Ill.

MEAT PIE.—Take one and one half pound of ground mutton, beef or veal, one finely chopped onion, season to taste, and enough canned tomatoes to make as thin as cake batter. Have bread dough ready and roll out one half inch thick and cut in six- or eight-inch squares. Place a portion of the mixture in each square and fold over and place in greased bread tin and let rise for three quarters of an hour. Then bake until dough is a nice light brown.

VEGETABLE SALAD.—This dish may be made from all kinds of cold cooked vegetables, such as Lima or string beans, carrots, turnip, onions, peas, cauliflower, beets, etc. Celery, cucumbers and green peppers add flavor and crispness. They should be cut fine and served very cold to get the best flavor. The French cook when making a vegetable salad will rub the inside of salad bowl with a slice of raw onion.

ITALIAN STEW.—Take one pound of any desired stew meat and fry in shortening. When well browned, add half-a-dozen onions, finely chopped, and several sticks of celery, cut into small pieces, and let cook until brown. Then add about three quarters of a cup of canned tomatoes, salt and pepper to season and a dash of cinnamon, cloves and nutmeg. Let boil one hour. Add water to keep it from burning. Any of the following ingredients are added to finish stew. With pork, use ripe olives and potatoes. With beef, potatoes and canned peas. With chicken, mushrooms. Rosemary is always used by us in pork; and garlic and chopped parsley before we put in the final vegetables.

PICKLED MEAT.—To pickle pork, put the spareribs, back bones or pieces of meat into a jar. Pack tightly. To every gallon of water used add one pound of salt, one half pound of brown sugar and one tablespoon of black pepper. Boil all together and pour over meat while it is boiling hot. Let set for three days, then pour brine off, boil and pour over the meat again. Be sure the brine covers the meat. Set in cool, dry place. Beef put up in this way will keep almost any length of time. The sugar preserves the meat and at the same time kills the taste of salt and it is almost like fresh meat.—MRS. W. C. LYNN, Bethesda, Ohio.

QUEEN OF PUDDINGS.—Soak one pint of fine bread-crumbs in one quart of fresh milk for three quarters of an hour. Beat the yolks of four eggs until light, and then beat in one cup of sugar and add to milk and crumbs, with the juice and grated rind of half a large lemon. Bake in a pudding dish in a moderate oven thirty-five minutes. Whip the whites of four eggs until light and frothy, then add four tablespoons of powdered sugar and beat again until dry and stiff. Spread a layer over the pudding, then dot generously with firm jelly, and add the remainder of white of egg. Return to oven and lightly brown. This pudding may be eaten warm or cold.

CABBAGE TAMALES.—Use either beef, veal or mutton. I take one and one half pounds of ground beef, one cup of rice (well washed) and one half can of tomatoes. Salt and pepper to taste. Mix well, then take cabbage leaves from head of cabbage that has been wilted in boiling water. Roll about two tablespoons in a leaf and place in kettle until you have used all the mixture. If there is any cabbage left, that should be added also, with the remaining half can of tomatoes. Put plate, weighted, on top so the leaves won't come unrolled. Add one quart of water and more if needed to cover well and boil one hour.—MRS. E. L. ZUMBRUMEN, Kemmerer, Wyo.

Driven Apart

"Is there something you want?" the nurse asked. "My wife," returned Neil.

He started off hurriedly in the direction the soldier had indicated.

Twice the ghoulish Dave Gorsline had been fired at.

"Sir," she spoke up eagerly, "I am, or was, Miss Beryl Grayson."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nicholas Berdyne, past middle age, his face marred by dissipation, schemes with Hartley Trenwyck to win Beryl Grayson, whose father is dead. She is engaged to Neil Preston, who goes to Alaska in the interest of a mine owned by Grayson and which falls into Berdyne's hands. Neil Preston is reported dead by Dave Gorsline, who is hired by Berdyne to tell Beryl. In her sorrow and loss of wealth, she refuses continued aid from Berdyne. Mr. Jackman from Denver, wanting to repay a debt owed to Beryl's father, invites Beryl to his ranch, where she forms a friendship for Tonita, a beautiful Mexican girl, who advises her not to marry Berdyne through any mistaken idea of gratitude. Irma Lee, discarded by Berdyne, warns Beryl that he serves his own selfish purpose and that Neil Preston lives and is on his way to Jackman's Ranch. Berdyne, persistent that Beryl shall become his wife, Neil Preston, overhearing her denunciation of his baseness and treachery and refusing to marry him, confronts Berdyne who swears he will follow his trail. The day Beryl Grayson becomes Berdyne's wife, Morley Preston, opposed to Neil's marriage, will tender Trenwyck a check for five thousand dollars and Berdyne will give a like sum. He admits Beryl's trust in Jackson and that the letter written offering her the home was inspired by him, that he holds a heavy mortgage on the Jackman ranch, and with this knowledge they plot to separate the lovers who plan to be married the following day. Jackman, a tool in Berdyne's and Trenwyck's hands, drugs the wine which he gives Beryl when he drinks with her to her happiness, and she, feeling dizzy and faint, goes to her room and the door is locked. Neil Preston, returning for Beryl, meets Tonita. Approaching Jackman's house, an automobile is in waiting and a man with Beryl in his arms appears from the house and lifts her into the car. Preston strikes him down, and taking the auto, with Tonita, they make their escape through the night for San Francisco. Trenwyck advises Berdyne not to go too far. Not to be foiled in capturing Beryl, they take an early train to San Francisco, wiring Gorsline to watch for the auto, the Red Flyer, which he locates near the residence of a minister, who is called early to perform a marriage ceremony, which is scarcely over, when there is a summons from the door. Berdyne enters, and Neil, struggling to defend his wife, reels and falls to the floor mid the chaos of an earthquake, while Beryl is borne helplessly away. Making her escape, she wanders back to Pine Street, searching the wrecked house in vain for her husband.

CHAPTER XIV.

NEIL BEGINS HIS SEARCH.

NEIL drifted back to life as out of a horrid dream. The supreme joy that had been his was blurred and blotted by the awful cataclysm that had shaken the minister's home like a house of cards. He dimly realized what must have happened, but he remembered only the rap on the door, Tonita's announcement that Berdyne was without, Beryl's outstretched hands and loving, pleading face, then the crash as the avalanche of masonry crunched its way through roof and ceiling. Now he awoke to find a white bandage about his temples, and himself lying on a mattress on the floor of a great hall.

On every side of him were mattresses and improvised cots. Anxious-faced women were moving about, ministering to those who suffered, or assisting physicians in their work of mercy. Here and there a white sheet spread over a silent form told a gruesome story that sent a shudder to Neil's heart. He lifted himself on one elbow, and a nurse, observing his movements, hurried toward him.

"Is there something you want?" the nurse asked.

"My wife," returned Neil, continuing to peer about him. "Is she here?"

"You were brought here by a young lady who hurried away as soon as the doctor told her you were not seriously hurt."

"Hurried away?" repeated Neil blankly.

"Yes. The young lady seemed in great excitement. She brought you in a wagon, which carried a number of other injured people from Pine Street. Do you feel better, sir?"

"There does not seem to be anything the matter with me."

The nurse smiled indulgently.

"You had a narrow escape," she said. "A brick from a falling chimney struck you a glancing blow on the head."

"But the young lady who brought me here," he persisted; "what was she like?"

"She was very dark——"

"Ah! It must have been Tonita."

"She looked like a Mexican girl, sir."

"How long have I been here?"

"Not more than an hour. This is the Mechanics' Pavilion, in temporary use as a hospital."

"There has been an earthquake?"

"The city, it is feared, has been destroyed."

"Beryl, my Beryl!" groaned Neil. "I wonder what has become of her while I have been lying here unconscious?"

He had not seen Berdyne when the latter swept into the parlor of the minister's home and bore Beryl from the room. At that moment he was lying prostrate and senseless.

"Perhaps," said the nurse, drawing a scrap of paper from her bosom, "this will give you some news of her you would find. It was left by the Mexican girl."

Neil took the folded paper, read it, and a low moan was wrenched from his tortured spirit.

The note was indeed from the Mexicana, and, although very brief, was of startling import:

"SENOR PRESTON: Berdyne has carried away our poor, dear Beryl. He used the automobile, and swept away with her under our stricken eyes. The city is in a turmoil, and search will be difficult; but, nevertheless, I go to do what I can. TONITA."

The paper fluttered from Neil's nerveless fingers, and he fell back on the cot, his face in his hands. Was there no defeating the vile plans of Berdyne? Was he to triumph, after all?

But, no! Beryl was now Neil's wife! In the midst of his grief Neil took some comfort from the thought. His pure, innocent darling would be saved from the crafty snare of that fiend in human form, and he—Neil—was the one to do it.

In a flash his mood changed, and he arose to his feet with a face full of fierce determination.

"Do you think you had better leave?" asked the nurse pityingly.

In the brief period the temporary hospital had been in operation, she had beheld much misery and learned of many broken hopes, yet no case had impressed her more deeply than that of this strong, noble young man whose bride of a moment had been snatched while he lay unconscious.

"I am no weakling," answered Neil, "and there can be no rest for me while my hapless darling is in the hands of one like this man Berdyne."

He took his hat, thanked her for what she had done, left a twenty-dollar bill in her hands to help on the good work of the hospital, and fared away in his search for Beryl.

A mighty task lay before him, as he realized as soon as he had reached the street and saw the devastation that surrounded him, but love was his inspiration. And when was there ever a task which love pronounced impossible? Heaven itself would be his Beryl's safeguard, and eternal justice would point him on!

Whither should he turn his steps? He could think of no place but the house in Pine Street. Perhaps in that place he would be able to pick up some clue which would lead him swiftly and surely to Berdyne. And, when he once found the man—— His strong right hand clenched with the thought, and his handsome face flamed with righteous wrath.

"I will find her," he murmured, over and over, "I will find her!"

As he took his way along Larkin Street, wending northward through crowds of stony-faced, half-dressed men and women, he observed a high structure on his right—a bony framework surmounted by a dome and rising out of a tangled heap of disrupted masonry. It was the ghost of the once lordly city hall, and his soul shuddered at the completeness of the ruin. Here and there he could see little spirals of smoke ascending, and he learned from those he passed that fires were starting and that the broken mains rendered the fire fighters helpless. The only way to fight the flames was with powder and dynamite, and he heard blast after blast from the regions around him.

He saw the gallant soldiers from the Presidio, who had appeared on the scene as if by magic, marching their measured beats; he saw a ghoul attempting to strip a dead body, and heard a shot from a soldier's rifle, which laid the robber lifeless across the form he had been despoiling; he heard women crying aloud for husbands and children, and he saw men searching frantically for the dear ones from whom they had become separated. Again and again soldiers turned him aside from the direct course he was following toward Pine Street.

His heart sickened with the thought that Beryl was abroad in that stricken city, worse off by far than if she had been alone. He groaned in his anguish and prayer to the Father to direct him, to guide him quickly to the place where his love and his vengeance might accomplish their double purpose.

His silent prayers were answered in part, in a way that seemed well-nigh miraculous. In Jones Street he came upon the wreck of an automobile. The car had been wrecked by a toppling wall, an immense stone having crushed the machinery forward of the front seat.

The flaming red of the car struck him as familiar, and his heart leaped with the discovery, a moment later, that it was the Red Flyer.

Berdyne's flight with his helpless victim had been interrupted. If compelled to proceed on foot, then Beryl could have appealed to those around her, and it would have been impossible for Berdyne to hold her against her will. How slight a thing will sometimes give ground for hope! Neil took heart of grace, and pressed onward toward Pine Street with feverish eagerness.

He came at last to his destination. The awful ruin of the minister's house filled him with horror. His darling could not be there; nevertheless, he would have gone dumbly into the falling structure in the vain hope that some clue might have been left for him.

"Halt!" cried a stern voice.

He whirled to find an infantryman grimly approaching him.

"It is necessary for me to go in there!" cried Neil. "I will take the chances."

"I will not allow you to enter," was the determined reply. "Stand back!"

"Sir," said Neil, "I was taken from there unconscious directly after the first great shock, and I have only now come from the Mechanics' Pavilion, which has been turned into a hospital. I am seeking——"

A strange light gleamed in the soldier's eyes.

"You are seeking your wife?" he interrupted.

"Yes, yes!" came from Neil eagerly.

"A beautiful girl with hair like gold, and——"

"Ah!" Neil cried, his heart almost bursting with the hope that suddenly filled it. "You have seen her?"

"She was here," said the soldier, "and she forced her way into the house in spite of me, to look for you."

"Then she is in there, and——"

"No, no!" The soldier caught his arm, and held him back by main strength. "She came out, looking like one whose brain had been turned by some terrible disappointment. She left—not more than five minutes since."

"Ah, Heaven!" groaned Neil, in despair. Then, recovering, he asked: "Which way did she go?"

The soldier pointed.

"She was alone?" demanded Neil.

"Yes."

He started off hurriedly in the direction the soldier had indicated.

"If she comes back," he called as he hastened on, "have her go to Golden Gate Park. Tell her that I am well, and that I will find her!"

But Beryl did not return while that soldier was on duty. Later in the day the fire drove the soldier away, and there was not even a ruin for Beryl to return to for the words of good cheer which the boy in blue was keeping for her.

Beryl and Neil were hopelessly entangled in the destruction of the great city.

CHAPTER XV.

PORTSMOUTH SQUARE.

The presence of the regulars from the Presidio had made looting a dangerous occupation. Twice the ghoulish Dave Gorsline had been fired at, and he had so narrowly missed being hit by the bullets that he had thought best to give up his pilfering operations—at least for the time. He had profited largely, however, and his pockets were heavy with rings, watches, brooches, silver and gold. Wherever he had seen a helpless fellow creature, he had pounced upon him like a harpy and wrenched away his valuables with brutal haste.

Once the depraved wretch had been pursued, and had only escaped by darting into a pretentious dwelling on Sutter Street. This house had withstood the great shock admirably. Windows were broken, chimneys had fallen and part of the room had tumbled in, but the walls still stood. The occupants had deserted the place, and Gorsline, who had the courage of the sneak thief and the prowler, took his ease in the place for a while. He lounged on rich divans, raided a pantry for cold food, and a sideboard for wine and cigars, and sighed to think that he could not appropriate the silver and some of the luxurious furnishings.

In due course he sallied forth once more, but found the soldiers thicker than ever. Presently he found himself in Portsmouth Square, and under the menacing shadow of the Hall of Justice. He shook his dirty fist at the building, then drew back in awe as a file of men came from the near-by morgue, bearing sheeted forms which were being placed in hastily improvised graves. It was after nine o'clock, and the morgue was in danger of fire.

As Gorsline turned away from the grisly spectacle, he felt a hand on his shoulder. He whirled like a cat, fearing an officer; then his fears subsided in a raucous laugh.

"Trenwyck!" he exclaimed.

The lawyer's face bore traces of excitement.

"Where's Berdyne?" he asked. "Do you know?"

"Not me," answered Gorsline. "He went off down Pine Street in that gasolene wagon of his, takin' the girl with him. I thought you was out o' the city by this time."

Trenwyck's excitement increased. He paid no attention to Gorsline's last remark, as there was something else in his crafty mind.

"If Berdyne took Beryl Grayson away with him," said he, "then something must have gone wrong."

"How do you figger it?" queried Gorsline.

"Why, because the girl is here, in Portsmouth Square!"

The ruffian flashed the lawyer a startled look with his small, beady eyes.

"Sure o' that, Trenwyck?"

"I can't be mistaken."

"Is the gal alone?"

"Yes. What do you suppose happened to Berdyne?"

"Ask me somethin' easy."

"If we had some place to take the girl," muttered Trenwyck, "and if we could get word to Berdyne——"

"How are we goin' to get word to any one in a town all shook up like this?" grunted the ruffian.

"Berdyne has a yacht off Sausalito, and——"

"Take me close, so'st I can git a good look at the gal," interrupted Gorsline. "Mebby you've made a mistake."

The square was thronging with Chinamen who had poured out of Chinatown, which lay away to the west. Each Oriental had a heap of his personal effects with him, and by threading their way among the Celestials and their piles of goods it was easy for the two scoundrels to approach the Stevenson Memorial, near which the girl Trenwyck had in mind was sitting.

It was really poor Beryl, whose weary wanderings had carried her to that place. Again the net of fate was spreading to enmesh her. The blows of adversity, which had been rained upon her suffering spirit, had benumbed her faculties. When she had left the ruins of the minister's home, she knew not whither she was going, nor cared. On reaching the square, thronged with its motley refugees, she had become conscious of overwhelming fatigue, and had sunk down to rest on the first convenient object that offered.

The wistfulness and grief that were mirrored in her sweet face would have touched a heart of stone; but the hard, cruel natures of the two plotters were incapable of pity. Beryl was sitting on a trunk, leaning against another which stood upright behind her. One of her hands was raised to her face, and the rare gem Neil had given her sparkled its lure in the eyes of the heartless ghoul.

"Berdyne will certainly not leave the city while the girl is here," whispered Trenwyck. "I know him too well. Unless he is too badly injured, or dead, you may rest assured that he is searching for her this minute. If there was some place to which we could take her until we could find Berdyne, I should be in favor of it."

"In the first place," mutterd Gorsline, "we may never find Berdyne."

"That goes without saying. And yet, we may."

"I know of a house on Sutter Street that held together purty well, an' there ain't no one in the place. If we could get her there, we might run our chances o' findin' Berdyne. If we didn't find him, and things got too hot, we could let the gal go."

"I don't think she will know me," said Trenwyck cunningly; "and I believe I can turn the trick and get her to go to the house you mention. It's a safe house, is it?" he added anxiously. "I've no mind to let a chimney or a wall tumble on top of me. I was frightened out of my senses when the shock began."

"You haven't got much sand, Trenwyck," returned Gorsline, with an evil grin. "How'll you get the gal to come to the place?"

"Trust me for that. She looks as though she was crazed and half out of her mind."

"That may help you."

"How am I to find this house you speak of? That's the point."

"Get the gal to come with you, and I'll keep jest ahead—far enough so she won't see an' reckernize me, but not so far but what you can keep me in sight. See? When I turn into the house you turn in there, too."

"We'll try it," said the scoundrelly Trenwyck.

Gorsline stood where he was and watched, his greedy eyes still on the precious stone that flashed on Beryl's finger. Trenwyck stepped forward, halted in front of a woman whose painted face and bold eyes told her character, alas! only too well, and asked:

"Pardon me, but are you Miss Beryl Grayson? I am seeking a person of that name who was recently in Pine Street, and who has become separated from her friends."

The woman crouching on a wooden box looked up into Trenwyck's face with a flippant leer. Nevertheless, his ruse succeeded. Beryl heard the crafty lawyer's question, and, in her distraught state, failed to perceive the artifice of such a random query. A flash of hope and understanding crossed her lovely face.

"Sir, she spoke up eagerly. "I am, or was, Miss Beryl Grayson. Oh, tell me quickly why you seek me!"

She did not recognize Trenwyck. Indeed, while the lawyer was at Sunset Ranch she had scarcely seen him, and had not once met him face to face.

With a pleased look on his face, Trenwyck stepped up to Beryl.

IF you want a lot of fun, give a "Hearty Party" on the evening of the fourteenth of February. This is not a great deal of trouble and always affords a good deal of wholesome excitement for the young folks and is fun to prepare for. Even the invitations should be different from the usual thing and be intended to mystify the expected guests and make them curious. So let them take the form of hearts cut from red cardboard or from stiff white paper with a little red crepe paper pasted on the back, but get the red cardboard if you can for this is the most effective. On the red cardboard write in violet ink or on the white paper in ordinary black ink the following effusion:

"Here's a hearty invite
For St. Valentine's night.
Bring your heart and I'll bring mine,
There'll be hearts of every kind,
Hearts of red and hearts of blue
And hearts of other colors, too.
Hearts that are sweet and hearts that are sour,
Hard hearts and dear hearts and hearts made of flour.

At eight o'clock just lift the latch,
You may get out without a scratch
Or maybe you will make a match.

P. S. My house is all rigged up for you,
So don't refuse whate'er you do.

Near the top of the right-hand lobe of the heart write your name and address, or, if the party is to be given by a young ladies' society at the Grange Hall or parish house of a church or in the town hall, write the name of the society and where the party is to be held and if there is to be a small price asked for admission write that also. In this case, line twelve of the verses must be changed right after the "P. S." from "My house" to "The hall," which will make it appropriate. Enclose each heart in an ordinary envelope, but paste a tiny red heart on the back like a seal.

If the affair is given by a society to raise a little money I think it will be much better not to charge any entrance fee, but make the money by charging for refreshments and for taking part in the pastimes I am going to tell you about. Before I forget, I want to say that there is no reason why the party should begin as late as eight o'clock, and if it is held by a society, six o'clock is a better time, and of course the invitation can be just as easily changed to read "six" as "eight."

But whether the party is given in your own home or in a hall, decorate the place a little so that it looks festive. This puts the guests in the right mood as soon as they enter the doors and everything goes off better in consequence. It won't cost much to do this as red paper is not expensive and anybody can cut out hearts large and small. Branches of pine, spruce, fir or other evergreen trees interspersed with hearts look very gay, indeed. In a prominent place tack up an enormous heart as large as a barrel head, put some pine tassels on it or better still, if you can get them, a bunch of pine cones, and underneath, right across the heart, print in big letters, "I AM PINING FOR YOU." Of course, anything else appropriate to St. Valentine can be used in the decorations. Old lace paper valentines, figures of Cupid, tiny bows and arrows, darts cut out of gold paper, etc., are all appropriate. Next get a small evergreen tree, or, if you cannot easily procure this, use branches tied firmly together and solidly mounted in a wooden box filled with stones and earth. Or, lacking any of these things, use a small kitchen clothes-horse with the rods painted green, or, if wanted for use again, covered with green crepe paper put on in stripes wound around it and held in place with paste. This, or the evergreen tree, is the Heart Tree, and on it are hung hearts of all colors cut from paper with a different fortune pasted on the back of each one. On the heart cut from gold paper is written:

Good as gold and wealthy, too,
Is the girl (or man) who's meant for you.

The red heart reads:
Now the fire of love will start
Red and glowing in your heart.

The green heart declares:
Through the country, through the town,
He (or she) is searching for you up and down.

The inscription on the blue heart is:
Your love is loyal, always true,
Is the fortune of the blue.

On the pale blue is written:
Bright blue eyes and brownest hair,
Has the one your home will share.

The pink heart says:
A rosy future you will claim,
Don't you wish you knew his (her) name?

Lastly, the purple heart proclaims:
Crown of laurel, robe of fame,
Has your partner in life's game.

Of course, if the party is too large you will need a great many more hearts than these, so duplicate some of the fortunes, and on others discard poetry and write a line or two right to the point in prose. Such as, "You will marry soon, but your partner will have red hair and a mean disposition," or, "Cupid is saving someone for you with the best heart in the world and a lot of good sense, too." In writing these things try, whenever you can, to make them apply to either sex, but when this cannot be conveniently done put in two words, as, for instance, "Your future husband (wife) is waiting for you just around the corner." It is impossible to separate the sexes in this game and either a man or woman can pull a heart from the tree. Then besides all these, there are on the tree hearts cut from cotton batting, labeled, "Your sweetheart has a soft heart"; hearts cut from red cardboard and torn across and worded, "A broken heart"; hearts of sandpaper, labeled, "Rough but useful"; a heart cut from tin or lead and labeled, "A heavy heart"; a heart with a feather stuck on it for a "Light heart"; a candy heart labeled, "A regular sweetheart", and so on.

The Heart Tree, which presents a very gay appearance with its bright-colored burden, stands on the floor or is planted in a flower pot and placed on a table, according to the size both of the tree and the number of guests at the party. Each person is blindfolded and led to the tree, from which he or she must pick the first heart the hand touches. After the fortunes have been read and laughed over, an old-fashioned but very jolly heart game can be played. This has no name but is played exactly like the old-time "Donkey Party." Perhaps you remember how in your childhood you tried vainly to pin the donkey's tail in the right place. Well, in this case, a big heart takes the place of the much abused donkey and the idea is for the guests to pin a tiny heart in the exact center of it. They must of course be blindfolded one at a time and whoever gets his heart in the proper position receives a small prize.

Have several small tables scattered through the room at which different heart games are to be played.

At one table provide squares of clean white cardboard, with ink and pens, pencils or colored crayons, and see which pair can within the given time prepare the most attractive valentine. The verse and the pen and ink or crayon decoration are originated by the players and executed by them. Or you might have the man write the verse and the girl draw or paint the decoration. Have several squares on the tables in order that those who finish before the time is up and who wish to do so, may try to improve upon their first efforts.

At another table arrange a contest to see who can form most other words out of the word valentine. Each word so formed counts one point, but words of sentiment or relating to the occasion are to be rewarded with five points each, and the one who wins the most points gets a prize.

Another that is novel is Floating Hearts. Cut from celluloid, preferably pink, a quantity of tiny hearts each with a perforation in it to be used in fishing. Set these little shapes afloat in a bowl of water, and let the players fish for them, counting one point for each heart caught. Improvise little fishing poles with sticks, red string or baby ribbon and little gilt hooks attached to the ribbon.

Then, if this is not enough for the evening's entertainment and you want the affair to end with something elaborate, why not play "Cupid's Arrows"? Make up as many heart frames out of wire as there are guests. Cover these for the men with red tissue paper and those for the women with white. Make enough "darts" to go around. Make them out of heavy cardboard box covers and cut them arrow shaped—they should be made double and glued or stretched together to make them heavier. They can be thrown with the hand like any dart. You may paint the wooden tips red and gild the cardboard shaft if you like.

Hang up the tissue paper hearts on a wire or string stretched across a corner of the room or between double doors, because the object is to throw the darts through the hearts and if they are against the wall the darts will not go through. The darts are covered on both sides with paper and when making them a small envelope containing a fortune is hidden inside between the two thicknesses of tissue paper.

Go to the magazines for the pictures to be used in these valentine "fortunes" for the game is that, tucked away in these envelopes, are the pictures of the future husbands and wives of the guests. Worlds of fun may be had in preparing these. For the men, cut out little pictures of charming young women, perhaps a ballet dancer, a face-cream advertisement girl, and be sure and get one or two pictures of old witches or women as ugly as possible.

For the ladies, cut out the men shown in the advertisements, one of a man shaving, his face all lather, one of a very fat man, also some pictures of soldiers, sailors, clothes advertising men, one of a man advertising some well-known brand of underwear, some old baldheaded man, etc. Paste these on little cards and put them in envelopes.

Give each guest a dart, let the ladies shoot at the red hearts first. Give them five chances if they miss, but if they fail after five chances it means that they cannot shoot again and they will be old maids. Then let the men throw the darts. As soon as the dart goes through the tissue paper—one guest at a time throwing so as to avoid confusion—he owns the envelope in it and pulls the heart down. If it is a home party, the hostess should tell the guests not to open the envelopes but wait until the contest is over and then write each guest's name under the picture won and pin them up on the wall for all to see.

The refreshments served should be in heart shape as much as possible. Cut the sandwich bread in the shape of plump hearts and use cream cheese, potted ham or tongue, canned salmon or something a little soft to stick them together. It is pretty to have one side of the heart of graham or brown-bread and one of white. Have heart-shaped cookies covered with a pretty pink frosting, tinted with the juice from a can of preserved strawberries or cherries. This not only looks very pretty indeed, but tastes delicious. Creamed oysters or creamed chicken decorated with scarlet hearts cut from sweet red peppers are also appreciated. You can always get these peppers canned if those "fresh" from the cold storage warehouse are not available. Cakes in heart shape, jellies made in a heart-shaped mould, ice-cream in heart shapes, can all be served. Lemonade, orangeade, grape-juice, punch or coffee make suitable drinks. Salad may be served, if you prefer it to the hot dishes mentioned, but when you make it, don't forget to cut out a heart from a pickled beet to decorate each plate.

In selecting a prize for the valentine affair, one's purse is the first thing to be considered,

Cubby Bear at the Coasting Party

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"YOU must rap louder if you are to rouse Cubby Bear," said Minnie Mink to Furry Otter. "A gentle tapping like that will not wake him from his sound winter sleep."

"He may not come out, after all," said Furry Otter, "but I shall try to coax him."

He rapped louder at Cubby Bear's window, calling, "Cubby! Cubby Bear! Wake up! Do you hear me?"

A fretful grumbling was heard inside, then a sleepy voice called, "It is winter, and time for sleeping. Please go away, and leave me alone, whoever you may be!"

"But, Cubby Bear," called Furry Otter. "Please do not go to sleep again yet! Wake up! I shall not half enjoy my party without you—do, please, tell me you will come!"

"A party!" cried Cubby Bear, and they heard him scrambling out of his warm bed. He came to the window, and threw it open. He was wide awake now. "A party!" he repeated, "and in the cold winter time!"

"Ah, but see what a fine night it is!" said Minnie Mink. "And the weather is mild for winter."

The snow-covered forest was lighted by a smiling silver moon, which rode high in the dark-blue, cloudless sky. Thousands of bright stars were twinkling gaily, winking at Cubby Bear in the most friendly manner.

"Tell me about it," he said.

"It is a coasting party," explained Furry Otter. "I have been getting ready for it for days, and have a beautiful, smooth slide on a little hillside by the Big Brook, not far above Busy Beaver's lodge. The company is gathering now, and I must hurry back. I did not invite you before, because I knew you would not like to be disturbed more than once."

"Get on your earmuffs and your red mittens, and come along with us," said Minnie Mink.

"My relatives have come from far and near," Furry Otter told Cubby, as they were on their way to the hill. "First, we shall slide as we like, to get in practice, and then there will be a coasting contest, and a prize will be given to the one who reaches the end of the slide the greatest number of times before the judge tells us to stop."

"What is a prize?" asked Cubby.

"Oh, a marvelous thing!" said Furry Otter; "the colors of the stars, all shining and beautiful. Busy Beaver gave it to me. He has had it in his lodge since last summer. Shinyblack Crow found it in the road, and gave it to him. Robbie Reddie, who does not fear to go about the village freely, says he has seen similar things hanging from ladies' ears."

"Ah!" said Minnie Mink, with a shake of her head, "human beings have such strange and unbelievable customs!"

Before they reached the hillside, they could hear the happy laughter and shouts of the coasters. It was a gay sight. Cubby Bear was surprised at the number of otters. He had seen none beside his friend, Furry Otter, before.

Busy Beaver and Brother Binney Beaver were there, Molly Muskrat, Foxy Reynard, Dr. Squilly Porcupine, curled up in a spikey ball, and Chirpy Chipmunk, who was skipping about briskly, trying to keep warm. Bunny Rabbit had not been able to come, as the Bunny Babies were sick with colds.

They drew near, to watch the coasters. Starting at the top of the little hill, all four paws spread out, they flew down the icy slide, going with a tremendous splash into the cold waters of the Big Brook at the foot of the hill. Cubby, watching them, gasped and shivered. Then, springing out, away they darted, up the hill at one side of the place where they went down, to slide again.

It was exciting sport. Otters were coasting past in quick succession, and Cubby Bear saw Busy Beaver and Mollie Muskrat go scooting by.

"Shall you slide, Cubby?" asked a voice at his elbow, and he turned, to find Racky Coon standing beside him.

"No; oh, no!" answered Cubby. "I have no mind to go splashing into the icy cold water in winter!"

"It is great sport," Minnie Mink assured him. "The exercise keeps one warm. Watch me!" And with a wave of her paw, she started off to join the merrymakers.

A young otter who was passing and had heard what was said, stopped, and looked at Cubby Bear with an unpleasant laugh.

"The bear slide!" he cried. "Not he! I laugh to think of it—with his slow, sleepy awkwardness! Why, he could not even get to the top of the hill. And as for diving in the brook—he would not dare!"

Cubby Bear looked at the otter in surprise, his face flushing beneath its furry covering. He was not used to such unkind remarks.

"Go on, Cubby. Do it!" urged little Chirpy Chipmunk.

"If you are still sleepy, it will wake you up," whispered Furry Otter.

"Show the rude stranger you are not afraid," said Brother Binney Beaver. "Come up the hill with me, and I will show you how to start."

Cubby hesitated. The steep glare of ice looked

"DOWN ON THE ICE—INTO THE WATER—OUT ON THE BANK."

"This is my friend, Cubby Bear," said Furry Otter, "and I have no doubt he could slide if he wished. Cubby—my cousin, Sammy Otter."

Cubby Bear determined not to be angry, and held out his red-mittened paw, but Sammy paid no attention to his friendly advances, and threw back his head laughing.

"I dare him!" he cried loudly. "I dare Cubby Bear to try coasting!"

dangerous, the dark waters cold. Then, "I will go," he said, and followed Brother Binney Beaver to the top of the hill.

"One slide will be enough," declared Sammy Otter.

"Spread out your paws," directed Binney, "to steer with. I am going down right behind you. All ready. Go!"

If his paws were to steer with, Cubby had no chance of learning. Down he went over the ice, and plunged into the Big Brook, so quickly he had no time to steer, or even to think.

The water closed over his head. Oh, he must breathe!

Why was he so foolish as to let a stranger laugh him into such a mad adventure as this? He struggled to the surface, gasping wildly. But here was good Brother Binney Beaver in the water beside him.

"Quick, Cubby!" he called, seizing him in a strong, helpful grasp. We must climb out, for others are coming."

They scrambled out, and Cubby shook the water from his shaggy coat.

"I will go again," he said, and shutting his teeth firmly together to keep them from chattering, he started to climb the hill once more.

"Good!" cried Brother Binney, and from the crowd of lookers-on, a cheer arose.

The second slide was not so terrifying, and when old Grandfather Otter, who was to time the race, called, in a high, squeaky voice, "Attention! the coasting contest will now commence!" Cubby determined to do his best to win. He took his place with the others at the top of the hill.

Sammy Otter was just beside him.

"You racing!" he jeered. "Ho, ho! why, everybody knows I shall win the prize. Even the other otters have no chance against me!"

Cubby made no reply, but stood ready with muscles strained, to start at the word "Go."

Down over the ice—into the water—out on the bank—tearing up the hill at their best speed—around and around and around went the racers in dizzying circles, while the watchers craned their necks to see, and shouted themselves hoarse.

Cubby Bear was out of breath, every muscle ached, he could not see clearly for the water in his eyes, it seemed as though he must drop out of the race, but still he did not give up. He must not let that Sammy Otter get an inch ahead of him!

Slide—splash—climb! Slide—splash—climb!

Was this a wild dream that he would laugh at next spring? What was it? He grew confused, but he did not stop, for Sammy Otter might pass him!

Slide—splash—climb!

"Time's up!" squeaked Grandfather Otter, just as Cubby plunged beneath the water.

A hard thump on the head confused and hurt him, and he cried out—it was Sammy Otter, who had made the plunge just behind him!

Then what a shout went up from the little people of the pleasant forest!

"Cubby Bear! Cubby Bear! Cubby wins! He's won the race!" a chorus of jubilant voices yelled, while Grandfather Otter called, over and over, until he could make himself heard.

"The coasting contest has been won by Cubby Bear. If he will come here, I will give him the prize."

A dozen willing paws pulled Cubby Bear from the Big Brook, and helped him up the hill.

Grandfather Otter held out the prize, saying, "Please accept this beautiful gold earring. Will you take it in your paw, or will you have a little hole made in your ear, so that you can wear it in the proper fashion?"

"In m-my paw, p-p-please. Tha-tha-thank y-you!" Cubby Bear stammered, having hard work to speak at all.

"He is all a-shiver and a-shake!" cried Dr. Squilly Porcupine indignantly, stepping forward. "Hear how his teeth chatter. He may be sick to pay for this night's work. I will take him home and put him to bed."

When they reached the house, Dr. Squilly roused Mamma Bruin, who was sleeping peacefully.

They started a fire, and warmed and rubbed the shivering Cubby, while Dr. Squilly Porcupine told Mamma Bruin of Furry Otter's party.

"I wish I had my medicine case here," sighed Squilly.

"I have some wintergreen leaves in the cupboard," said Mamma Bruin. "We will steep them, and give him the hot tea to drink."

When at last Cubby was tucked into his little bed, he murmured drowsily, "It was a fine party. I hope Furry Otter will have another next—nex——" and dropped off to sleep before finishing his sentence.

Mamma Bruin was yawning behind her huge paw.

"Good by, Dr. Squilly," she said, "and thank you for being so kind to my little Cubby. He is sound asleep now, and we shall not awaken again until the coming of spring."

ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

HOP up onto my lap and give me your close attention, for I have a very important matter that I want you to ponder over; it is the subject of inquiry by Robert S. Lawrence, Newcomerstown, Ohio, who says in his recent letter to me:

"I certainly enjoy reading your discussion on various topics for they have been very helpful to me and to every sound-minded, patriotic person who reads COMFORT. What do you think will be the final outcome of this racial conflict, which is seemingly sapping the very vitals of our dear old U. S. A.? Do you believe our dear Old Glory will be wiped in the dust? Several well-informed men in the community have asked me to write and find out what you think about it."

Robert, I regret to say I cannot answer freely and frankly the vital matter you have asked me to discuss. I can only deal in abstract generalities and not concrete facts. This much, however, I can say: I am very pessimistic as to the future of this country. You can't build a house without good material, and neither can you build a nation, unless you have the cement of a common ideal, a common patriotism and brotherly affection to hold the various racial bricks together and make the structure durable. You have got to have national brotherhood before you can have international fraternity. Old-World discords have been planted in our soil, and, like noxious weeds, are flourishing amazingly, and are of more consequence to various irreconcilable groups than are those matters which vitally concern our nation as a whole. There is one racial group so aggressive and powerful politically and so perfectly organized that no editor or publication dare mention its name except to slobber it with fulsome and sickening praise. Our country will come under the control of those who will be able to grab most political power. Now watch the names of those who hold offices and you will see who holds the power and you will be able to determine who will eventually dominate us.

This country made a fatal and terrible mistake in allowing these shores to be made a dumping ground for all the races of the earth. We should have selected the ingredients that went into our national pudding with more care. We did not do so, and now, instead of a pudding, we've got a mess that I fear we can never assimilate or digest. If we breed from fifty different racial strains, we shall have a race, not of men, but of mongrels. The Puritan and the Pilgrim were the finest types of manhood, and, though far from perfect, the strongest in character and political and spiritual development the world had ever seen up to that time. If you are not aware of this, you are blind to the most vital fact in your history. It was Anglo-Saxon ideas, ideals, virtues, genius, respect for law, love of freedom and love of God, that made us a nation, and it was the spirit we imbibed from those great souls and their genius that has vitalized and given to our institutions all those principles that keep this national structure, now a very Tower of Babel, from disintegrating and falling to pieces. But the Plymouth strain is growing thin and anaemic.

Old Glory will wave just as long as those who believe in the ideals which it symbolizes are in the majority and ready and willing to get behind their flag, and not a second longer. If the majority of the people decide that they want the black flag of anarchy or the red flag of socialism; decide that they prefer the dictatorship of a group of proletarian fanatics, class consciousness to national consciousness; or prefer the tyranny of some racial group within or foreign powers without, political or ecclesiastical or decide they want to live in spiritual bondage under some religious sect or denomination (for nothing is impossible, as man has not yet found himself, but is still groping in the dark, hiding his eyes from the light, stumbling along the blind alleys of selfishness that lead to nowhere), then we shall have to submit to all sorts of agonies until men become sane, sensible and brotherly.

The struggle of various racial groups to dominate the politics of this country will continue so long as our affairs are run by pothouse politicians instead of statesmen. Partizanship, parochialism, sectionalism and all the other evil isms, that disintegrate instead of integrate our national life, are as rampant today as they were fifty years ago. A common danger drew us together, temporarily at least, during the war, but directly that danger disappeared, we all fell back into our narrow ruts of distrust and suspicion and began making faces at one another in the same old, stupid, inhuman way.

Without a common language and a common ideal, and we have neither, no nation can last, ours least of all, because we have stood idly by and let millions of inferior racial strains contaminate the blood stream of the great races who laid the foundations of this Republic. That contamination must stop. Immigration must, and will, be regulated, and the life-giving elements in our body politic strengthened and renewed. We should especially welcome those who speak our tongue, for ours is the language of liberty and freedom, and those who refuse to learn and speak the finest language on earth should be deported. As I have frequently said before, we must breed from within and not depend on growth from without, and we must breed citizens and not harbor undesirable plotters. Another thing, too, we must learn to do our own dirty, as well as our clean, work. The colored lady will no longer wash our linen and Rastus will refuse to polish our shoes. If we want coal, we must mine it ourselves; if we want tunnels dug, railroads constructed, mountains bored, it is our hands that must do it. We must appreciate the dignity of labor and recognize the fact that overalls can be just as closely associated with gentility and culture as high silk hats and dress suits. We should not allow any racial group to become so dominant and powerful that its influence can overawe and terrify Congress, as was the case with the German group, previous to the war. It is the custom for the members of a certain racial group to brag that there are from twenty to thirty million people of their blood in this country. Up jumps another racial group and claims another thirty or forty million, and these groups take particular pains to remind us that their blood-strain is superior to all others; and these unpleasant reminders which are a covert threat to the nation as a whole, come from people who are not Americanized, for if they were they would not, when making these boastful statements, add insult to injury, by dragging out the eternal and hateful hyphen when referring to their nationality. We killed the hyphen during the war, but it is flourishing again with all its old deadly and menacing virulence.

If complete Americanization is impossible, then all nationalities should at least keep perfect alignment. No one should step from the ranks, break up the formation and attempt to control the rest of us or make our Congress and our legislatures, not the abode of statesmen but mere political bargain counters. If there is any commanding to be done, Uncle Sam will do it. As regards the future of this country, Macauley, the great historian, writing in the Victorian era, said: "As for America, I appeal to the Twentieth Century. Either some Cæsar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand or your republic will be as fiercely plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the Twentieth Century as the Roman Empire was in the Fifth, with this difference, that the Huns and Vandals who ravaged Rome came from without her borders while your Huns and Vandals will be engendered within your own country and by your own institutions."

The great philosopher, Herbert Spencer, in a similar prophetic strain, wrote thus: "We have bad times before us, and you have still more dreadful times before you, civil war, immense bloodshed and eventually military despotism of the severest type." De Toqueville, who wrote a wonderful work, "Democracy in America," also predicted that "Aliens who had no stake in our country and were un-Americanized would finally ruin our republic."

We need not be discouraged by the gloomy prognostications of Macauley or Spencer, though their predictions will inevitably be fulfilled unless America is Americanized drastically and thoroughly. Every year or two a house has to be repainted and the roof tarred, or it soon decays. We have neither painted our house nor tarred its roof. We have let it get along any old way that it could and the result is it is sagging at the knees and threatening to fall about our ears. We have been so busy making money or spending money, so busy playing politics, and senseless politics at that, that enemies without and within, grown bold by your fatuous indifference and incompetence, now threaten to destroy the whole fabric of our government. But I feel confident there is too much good, sound, common sense among the better elements of the American people to ever permit a repetition in this country of the horrors that have taken place in Russia. But do not let us delude ourselves or push our heads in the sand and do the ostrich act as we did before the war, and shut our eyes to all that is taking place around us, or our necks will be severed and our bodies left to the tender mercies of the criminal buzzards and jackals that abound in every social state and look with eyes of envy on the things that the orderly and industrious have created, while these vermin plotted, loafed and idled. Remember that this is 1920 and not 1776. Science has demolished space and China is nearer Washington today than Rhode Island was 150 years ago. Our fortunes are linked up with the rest of humanity, and we must cultivate friendly relations with other nations. Not many generations ahead there will be a billion Chinamen instead of four hundred million; then, unless you have done your duty by him, you may have a real yellow peril on your hands. One thing we must do and do immediately, and that is to cultivate the friendliest possible relations with English-speaking peoples the world over, for our ideals, if not our interests, are identical, and it is ideals that always count in the long run. Everybody here must speak English, or American, if you prefer to have it that way. It is the language of liberty and freedom and the best language on earth. It is the language of trade and has become the language of diplomacy. The English-speaking peoples are the burden bearers of civilization; they must aid and shepherd their weaker brothers until they are able to take care of themselves. It is the Pilgrim stock that has opened up the waste places of the earth, made the waterways of the world safe for commerce and dumped more Bibles in heathen laps than Mr. Heathen will be able to digest in a century. But he will digest them eventually, for Christianity is the only live-wire religion. Even the Bolsheviks are beginning to ask: "Can man live without Christ?" Unless we accept this burden, the Christ burden, the civilization of the white man will perish. It is a heavy burden to bear but none of the other nations of the world are capable of bearing it. Though in terms of years the human race may seem old to you, it is still very young in all that makes for goodness, humanity and decency. Merely struggling to live right ourselves is not sufficient, we must help others to live right, and we must protest when others live wrong and do wrong, for what hurts one hurts all. Our work in the Philippines shows what can be done for a backward people. If there is any other than the Anglo-Saxon race that can do better than America and Britain have done, let it step forward and do it. All these world-opening and uplifting enterprises may be based on selfishness but without enlightened selfishness no one does anything, and after self has done its rough pioneering part, idealism will put on the polish. The merging of various radical elements for political ends is a very real menace to our existence. You will probably have a very vivid illustration of the workings of this menace at our next presidential election, which from all indications will be staged along racial lines and for purposes which do not vitally concern the interests of this Republic. Some loud-mouthed demagogue will eventually, for his own selfish political ends, bring one or two groups together, camouflaging the maneuver under a very deluge of flag-waving and fake Americanism, and Old Glory will be shoved in your faces, but you will not need much vision to look through its starry folds and behold the evil, destructive thing that lurks behind it. Kill the snakes of alienism, Bolshevism and anarchy and put men in office who are honest, unafraid and 100 per cent American, and the racial problem will settle itself.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only boy? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

JACKSBORO, R. R. 1, TEX.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

As I am lonesome I will write you. Am five feet four inches tall, weigh one hundred pounds, have brown hair and light complexion. I live about half a mile from Cundiff. We have not any postoffice there so I live on a root. Cundiff is a small town fifteen miles northeast of Jacksboro. It has two stores, two garages, two churches and a new schoolhouse. I am in the seventh grade. My age is between twelve and fifteen. I surely am glad the war is over, are you not? November 11, was the day the armistice was signed. What do you do for pastime? I crochet and go to school. I had the flu but it was not at all pleasant. Uncle Charlie, if you want a job come down here and pick cotton for us. We will board you and pay you three dollars per hundard.

RUTHIE D. SMITH.

So, Ruthie, you live on a root, do you? Like myself, you are a first-class vegetarian. I hope, however, you have more than one root to chew on or your diet will become somewhat monotonous. Which root are you patronizing just now—carrots, parsnips, mangel-wurzel or beets? People eat too much meat entirely and it pleases me immensely to know there is a young lady in Texas, who has recognized the nutritive value of the root crop. Personally, I hope you are chewing on a carrot, as there is no more valuable food. My doctor makes me take carrot soup two or three times a week, and he even prescribes it for ailing babies with remarkable results. The only thing I have against carrots is, they store sugar and in the present sugar shortage I think such an act is little short of criminal. Money is the root of all evil, it is about the only root humanity will persist in chewing on. We have a very distinguished member of the root family in New York—Elihu Root. As Mr. Roof, however, is a lawyer, you had better not monkey with him or you will be liable to be bitten instead of getting a bite. Pity the President didn't take that Root to Paris to chew on. Had he done so the world might have been at peace and getting back to normal conditions. The war isn't over, my dear, and won't be for many years. We only won one round of the international scrap. We did not stay long enough to score a knockout. Germany is still in the ring and the ring won't hold her long. There are a lot of elements in this world that will never quit fighting until they get their own way, and as no decent human could live if they had their way, the fight has got to go on. Whenever you plant an honest crop, up grow the weeds and try to choke it. It is the same with the human crop. You've got to root out the criminal weeds and exterminate them or they will exterminate you. We went over to Europe to hoe up some very wicked weeds, but we did not stay long enough to do a thorough job and the result is the weeds are all coming back and laughing at us. It takes more than an armistice with shouting, screaming, yelling, singing, parading and a general exhibition of national hysteria to bring about a peace with Germany, let alone a world peace. There is a nice weed crop to the south of us in Mexico that may be under the hoeing process before these words are in print, though I have always fervently hoped the Mexicans would have sense enough to hoe up their own weeds. The Mexican, however, is about ninety per cent Indian and he does today what the Indian tribes did of old in this country when each tribe tried to exterminate the other. The world is tired of the weed crop and wants to get down to an honest, sensible plane of living. Unless we want to be choked by the weeds within and without, we shall be forced, whether we like it or not, for the sake of self-preservation, which is the first law of nature, to join hands with the honest-crop nations and exterminate the weed menace before it exterminates us. Ruthie, it is awfully kind of you to offer me a job picking cotton. If things continue as they are going at present I shall be very glad to accept your offer, for only the man who works with his hands is to be allowed to live and the brain worker is to be chased out of existence. After the brain workers, the artists, the thinkers, the poets, the writers, the musicians, the engineers the scientists, have been killed off, then you'll have a fine bughouse world worse than forty hells; for when the brains go the soul will go, and when the soul goes, the abysmal beast, the gorilla and the chimpanzee will take possession. I am glad to know the South is getting a high price for its cotton. What a contrast to when the war began and we were implored to buy cotton at ten cents a pound. It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good, after all. By the way, Ruthie, what is a hundard? The Goat says he thinks you mean a hundred. Let us hope so.

CHOUPIQUE, LA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am going on thirteen years of age and am in the sixth grade. We have not been taking the COMFORT very long, but I don't see what people mean if they don't take COMFORT and join the League. We live on a farm and have lots of peaches and figs. Daddy is going to get me a horse to ride to school this year if I want one. I can ride and go in the car. What would you do if you were me?

Yours lovingly, DANIEL LACY.

Vernie, I am not at all surprised to find that the transportation problem is so acute in Louisiana as it is in the country, and, for that matter, the world o'er. Once on a time a man had to hoof it if he wanted to go anywhere. Then he discovered he could move quicker if he tamed a wild horse and got astride its back. Later on he hitched the horse to a carriage; then the locomotive engine appeared on the scene and the street car. The automobile and the airship followed in quick succession. Man is a great success at moving his body, but in the mass he is an awful failure when it comes to moving his mind. He still lets that crawl, and it always crawls in a rut or on a single track. Mechanically, man has progressed marvelously, but economically, physically, spiritually, mentally, morally, he is still millions of years behind the material creations of his brain. In spite of the fact that wages have doubled, trebled and quadrupled in some cases and that everything that goes into running and constructing a railroad

Little Stories of Roosevelt

By Carl Schurz Lowden

His Creed

"LET us therefore boldly face the life of strife, resolute to do our duty well and manfully; resolute to uphold righteousness by deed and by word; resolute to be both honest and brave; to serve high ideals, yet to use practical methods. Above all, let us shrink from no strife, moral or physical, within or without the nation, provided we are certain that the strife is justified, for it is only through strife, through hard and dangerous endeavor, that we shall ultimately win the goal of true national greatness."—From his essay, "The Strenuous Life."

The Only Licking He Ever Got

"He was a regular boy," said a Long Island coachman of the youthful Theodore. "Always outdoors, climbin' trees, and havin' queer things alive in his pockets. Sometimes it was even a snake."

Perhaps it was a snake that caused the tussle between Ted and his sister. No girl relishes the sight of a reptile. Anyhow the two of them staged a small battle in which the boy became cannibalistic and bit his opponent's arm severely.

HE HAD AN OLD-FASHIONED FATHER.

The girl cried out because of the pain and the sight of the blood. Presently their father came in and asked where the culprit was hiding. But Ted had gone into the kitchen, grabbed a wad of dough off the table, and then sneaked under it where the broad skirt of the cook helped to conceal him.

Daddy Roosevelt knew that the Irish cook and his son were very good friends and he surmised that Ted might have taken refuge near her. Accordingly he advanced into the kitchen and made inquiry.

He could obtain little information regarding his lost son. However, he hung around a while and kept an eye on the kind-hearted woman. Soon he observed her slyly looking beneath the table; and then, with the secret out, Ted promptly emerged from his hiding-place.

As the boy slipped through the door into the adjoining room, he hurled the bit of dough at his father, but the missile did not stop the chase. Ted started up the stairs. Alas and alack! At the half-way point the boy was caught, jerked across the parental knees, and given a Rooseveltian paddling. It was the only licking his father ever administered unto his namesake.

Indian Marauders

When Roosevelt mounted his horse near noon of a fine day to make an exploring trip to the north and east of his Elkhorn ranch, he scarcely expected a thrilling adventure. However, he kept his thinking-cap firmly on his head and afterwards spoke of the incident as trivial.

He had risen up a slight rise and emerged onto a small plain or plateau when five young Indians suddenly came over the opposite edge, yelled, waved their rifles, and charged. They were of the irresponsible age, neither babies nor men, and they meant mischief. Sometimes these red hoodlums would deprive a lone rider of his horse, rifle and money.

"Four Eyes," given the name because his defective vision necessitated the wearing of spectacles, waited until they reached a point one hundred yards distant. Then he halted his mount, jumped off, threw his rifle over the animal's back, and quietly took aim at the leader.

STANDING OFF THE INDIAN MARAUDERS.

Apparently the young bucks had expected to overawe the white man, but they did not know Roosevelt or they would have understood the impossibility of such tactics. When they saw him peering along the gun's sights, they immediately retreated out of range and parleyed among themselves.

Soon one of the group advanced alone, dropped his weapon, flourished his blanket, and assumed the attitude of a friend. He halted about fifty yards from the dismounted rider and pulled out his pass from the Indian reservation.

"How!" he warmly declared. "Me good Indian."

Roosevelt answered "How!" and told the leader to refrain from coming any closer. When the other braves edged nearer, the plainsman covered the leader with his rifle and advised the band to clear out.

They swore profusely but complied. A few hours later T. R. met a couple of trappers who asserted the young Indians had forced them to surrender their horses.

Roosevelt's Chivalrous Deference to His Wife

Among the interesting anecdotes told by Hamlin Garland in Everybody's Magazine under title of "My Neighbor, Theodore Roosevelt," is one which gives an intimate glimpse of Mr. Roosevelt's home life and his respect for and devotion to his wife. Mr. Garland was Mr. Roosevelt's guest at the White House on several occasions and he describes one of these as follows:

"One day I lunched with him in the small room just to the right of the door, for the main dining-room was being redecorated, and the sound of the floor-polisher was heard in the hall. Mrs. Roosevelt, Alice and two of the boys were present, and I had the pleasure of seeing President Roosevelt in the midst of his very lively family. To watch the mighty hunter and Chief Executive play the part of husband and father increased my regard for him. Powerful as he was, impetuous as he seemed, he was in truth consideration itself when he came into relationship with his wife. No matter what his impassioned discourse might be, the slightest motion of her hand, a lifted eyebrow, would arrest him at once.

"This chivalrous deference on his part moved me to announce that I had made a discovery.

"'A discovery,' he asked. 'What have you discovered?'

"'I have discovered the actual ruler of the United States,' I answered, with a glance at Mrs. Roosevelt.

"The President laughed heartily, and Alice, with a smile of roguish amusement, declared my discovery a true one. The President then said: 'You are perfectly right. I am only the public appearance—Mrs. Roosevelt is the force behind the throne.'"

The Kaiser Admired Roosevelt

Writing of his visit to the Colonel at his home at Oyster Bay in 1917, Mr. Garland says:

"Among other things our host showed us the drawing which the German Emperor had sent to him while in the White House, and also a remarkable series of photographs of the Kaiser and himself taken during a military review at Potsdam or somewhere else. On the back of each picture in the Kaiser's own handwriting were certain descriptive lines which testified to his high admiration of his great American visitor. "When we shake hands we shake the world," was the essential meaning of these inscriptions. Roosevelt showed them to me with a smile of comic significance. They were one of his most amusing "exhibits."

Backed the Kaiser Down

In 1901, Venezuela, a shiftless little South American nation, was deeply in debt to England, Italy and Germany. The three powers tried a "pacific blockade" but it proved ineffective. On December 8, 1902, Germany severed diplomatic relations, which act invariably precedes war.

With the Monroe Doctrine seriously threatened, Roosevelt got into the game. He asked the interested nations to arbitrate. England and Italy agreed to that method of settlement, but Germany wished to take temporary possession of the little nation and refused to consider any other plan.

"WHEN WE SHAKE HANDS WE SHAKE THE WORLD."
—WILHELM.

Thereupon the President summoned the German envoy to the White House and gave him some plain speech. He did not mince his words for he wanted Germany to understand his position in the matter.

"Dr. Holleben," he warned, "unless your country consents to arbitrate, Admiral Dewey's squadron will be given orders, by noon ten days from today, to proceed to the Venezuelan coast and prevent any aggression against that territory."

The ambassador began to protest. He said that his Imperial master, having refused arbitration, could not change his decision. Such action was a manifest impossibility.

"I am not arguing that question," our forceful executive answered. "I am simply giving you the information because you may think it of sufficient importance to transmit it to Berlin."

A week later the German called upon President Roosevelt but did not mention the Venezuelan controversy. When he arose to go the redoubtable Theodore asked him about the matter. No word had been received from the Kaiser.

"In view of this fact," the President declared, "I will instruct Admiral Dewey to sail a day earlier than the day I designated at our previous meeting."

Though Dr. Holleben implored and pleaded, Roosevelt remained as a stone wall. He insisted there must be an immediate acceptance of the arbitration method of settlement as, otherwise, the job would be turned over to Dewey and the navy.

The President named forty-eight hours as the period during which he would wait for a final answer. The cable must have been greased, however, for within thirty-six hours the ambassador returned to the White House with the Kaiser's compliance.

A real American had flourished the Big Stick and driven the Kaiser into his boots.

The Boy with the Black Eye

In his college days at Harvard the young citizen built up his health by boxing at the gymnasium at various times each week, but on Sundays he taught the Bible to a class of boys at the Dutch Reformed church in New York City. Today there are few Christians among boxers. Roosevelt saw no incompatibility between boxing for muscular development and teaching a Sunday School class as a part of his religious life.

REWARDS THE BOY WHO FOUGHT FOR HIS SISTER.

One morning a boy with a black eye appeared in the class. The college student noted the physical blemish and questioned the boy to ascertain how he got it. The boy admitted he had been in a fight and that his adversary had struck his eye.

Roosevelt worked with the boy until he got the whole story. A mean fellow had pinched his sister. He had warned the offender to desist. When the tormentor continued his obnoxious attentions, the brother interferred with his fists.

"You did perfectly right," Theodore commended. Thereupon he backed up his words by opening his pocketbook and extracting a dollar which he handed to the boy. "Take this," he advised, "and get a poultice for your bad eye."

This incident made the teacher very popular with his class, for every member believed the brother had done the right thing in endeavoring to protect his sister. The church authorities, however, were much displeased by the college student's act in rewarding the boy for fighting. Within a few weeks Roosevelt obtained a class in another church.

advantage of the situation and, on the pretext of restoring order and establishing a stable government in Mexico, sent over a naval and military force by means of which he conquered the country, made it a monarchy and set up Maximilian, an Austrian prince, as emperor with a French army of occupation to uphold his throne. Because the exigencies of the Civil War were straining the resources of our country, President Lincoln could do no more than protest against this flagrant violation of the Monroe Doctrine.

General Grant regarded the French Emperor's performance as an act of war against the United States and believed that our Government should treat it as such as soon as its hands were free to strike. Accordingly he seized the first safe opportunity to put Uncle Sam's fist in Louis Napoleon's face by sending an army to the Mexican border to threaten Maximilian's French troops. This he did immediately after the surrender of General Lee, and he has hinted, in his "Personal Memoirs," that his haste was due to apprehension that his order might be countermanded by the War Department. The following is Grant's own description of the incident:

"After the surrender of Lee, therefore, entertaining the opinion [that the French intervention in Mexico was an act of war against the United States] here expressed, I sent Sheridan with a corps to the Rio Grande to have him where he might aid Juares [the leader of the Mexican patriots] in expelling the French from Mexico. Those troops got off before they could be stopped; and went to the Rio Grande, where Sheridan distributed them up and down the river, much to the consternation of the [French] troops in the quarter of Mexico bordering on that stream."

This threatening attitude brought about immediate negotiations between Louis Napoleon and our Government which resulted in the withdrawal of the French soldiers from Mexico. Maximilian refused to return to Europe with the French expeditionary forces, preferring to die Emperor of Mexico rather than live an exiled monarch. The Mexicans made short work of him after the departure of the foreign invaders.

Louis Napoleon had counted on the Civil War to ruin our country, but when he saw it emerge from the conflict with the largest, finest and best equipped veteran army in the world, prepared and determined to settle his case, he knew that resistance was hopeless and was forced to accept ignominious defeat which so lowered him in the estimation of his own subjects that he felt compelled to attempt conquest in another direction in order to recover his waning popularity and prop his tottering throne. And so he launched his short, disastrous war against Prussia, which resulted in his being deposed and banished by his own people, and in France having to pay an enormous war indemnity in addition to the loss of two rich provinces, Alsace and Lorraine (recently restored to France in the settlement of the World War).

General Grant said that "the signal failure of Louis Napoleon's scheme of conquest in Mexico was the precursor of his own overthrow. The beginning of his downfall was when he landed troops on this continent. To recover the prestige he lost in this enterprise he made war on Prussia—and fell."

One of the reservations demanded by the majority senators is designed to save the Monroe Doctrine by denying the League of Nations any authority over this exclusively American policy.

Roosevelt's Place in History

At the present writing it is but a year since Roosevelt left us, but already the library shelves abound in volumes narrating, interpreting and commenting on the deeds and words and the life lesson of this many-sided leader of American thought and action.

His ideals were high, his theories practical, his judgment sound, his talk sincere and unequivocal, his action straightforward, fearless and energetic, and with a strenuous nature and an amazing capacity for work his career is a record of wonderful achievements in the realm of public leadership. He was a living example of the patriotism, honesty, integrity and clean living that he preached. Like Washington, he was "first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen." Necessarily he made many enemies, but even those who opposed him now for the most part acknowledge his greatness. In the service he rendered to his country and to humanity he ranks with Washington and Lincoln. He gave and took hard blows in sportsmanlike manner, and even his faults were of the genuine and humanizing sort that seems to strengthen the bond of sympathy between a great leader and the commonality of the masses. No man's character and career were ever more carefully raked over and searched than his, and without the discovery of a mean trait or dishonorable act.

He was the apostle of the "square deal" in private and public affairs and in international intercourse, of peace with honor, of a strong and dignified foreign policy, of preparedness for national defense as a means of avoiding war, commanding respect for our rights and, if necessary, enforcing it.

He was noted for his broad views and progressive ideas, but he was steadfast in his support of the traditional policies that had contributed so largely to the growth of our country in prosperity and power. He had no patience with those who would have us cast aside as antiquated the advice of Washington or the policies of Monroe, Lincoln and Grant.

He believed in minding our own business. He preached "America First." He denounced treaties which subjected disputes involving our internal affairs, vital interests or national honor to the judgment and determination of foreign arbitration boards.

As President he forced the Kaiser to accept the Monroe Doctrine in the Venezuela controversy.

In his address on "Washington's Forgotten Maxim," he said:

"A century has passed since Washington wrote: 'To be prepared for war is the most effectual means to promote peace.' We pay this maxim the lip loyalty we so often pay to Washington's words; but it has never sunk deep into our hearts. Indeed, of late years many persons have refused it even the poor tribute of lip loyalty."

Roosevelt's death was untimely, for our country and the perturbed and distracted world, reaping the aftermath of war, needs his prevision and sympathetic understanding to help in guiding the work of reconstruction along progressive but safe and sane lines.

The Secret of My Bargains

For many, many years I was a buyer of ladies' wearing apparel. I got to know mills and makers everywhere. I learned where to look for the very choicest bargains. In my own business as I am able to apply all this experience and to make very wonderful savings.

I do away with all extravagances like fancy store space and high rents. I never have left-over stocks or sacrifice sales. My book is my only salesman. I have no high priced sales people. I deal direct with mills and makers, and I buy in such big quantities that I get rock-bottom prices. I cut out all the profits of the retailer, wholesaler and jobber.

The biggest saving of all comes in this way: Nearly all dealers and stores charge for the appearance of a garment. It doesn't make any difference what it actually costs. If a style turns out unusually popular, an extra price is put on it. That is why there is so much false value in women's clothes. I never do this. The same small profit goes on everything—neither more or less.

Everything a Woman Wears Sent Prepaid On Approval

I show 1001 styles in my latest Spring book. Any of them will be sent to you in just as easy and simple a manner as the sweater shown on this page. Your mere request and a trifling first payment is all I ask. Bear in mind this is not a C. O. D. offer or anything like that. Your selections are delivered right into your home for two days' free examination and I prepay all delivery chargs. If you return your selections, I pay the cost back to me and immediately refund any payments you have made. Nothing could be more satisfactory or free from bother or red tape.

I wish to say a word for Uncle Charlie. If we had him for our President and a Congress that would back him up, wouldn't we have an ideal government? Let's give him a coin shower for his valentine. I want his name and address as I want to send him a check. I want him to endorse it and Billy the Goat to chew one corner of it so I will have both their signatures. Let everyone send him some money and Billy the Goat can have the envelopes instead of hay this winter.

My address is with Mrs. Wilkinson.

Uncle Charlie's address is 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., and I am sure Billy the Goat will be delighted to chew the whole four corners off as many checks as you care to send—with never a thought of germs. I'll speak to him about it.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

I have never seen a letter in COMFORT from this part of the state. I am not gifted with the pen as are so many of you but I certainly enjoy the letters. I often tell my neighbors that I couldn't keep house without COMFORT. I have just sent in a two-year renewal and I don't mean to be without it as long as I live.

We are very busy here; there is always something to be done on a farm.

HELEN AND ANDY PAUL DEMONIA.

I am sending a photograph of my two babies and hope Mrs. Wilkinson will find space to print them. Helen is five years old and Andy Paul is two and one half years. Their father died when the baby was four months old. No one knows how desolate our home is.

I am twenty-seven years old and have brown hair and eyes and weigh 135 pounds.

Wishing each one happiness and prosperity, I am your new sister, MRS. LENA B. DEMONIA.

GRANT, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

As I have never noticed a sister's letter from this vicinity and very few from Michigan, I am going to add my mite to the list. I have read COMFORT since I was a little girl at home and now that I am in my own home I see that my subscription never runs out.

Michigan is a great playground for tourists and well-to-do people who like to get out among the woods and lakes in the summer time and there is always a rush of automobiles, especially during July and August. There is a great deal of excellent farm and dairy land here. Naturally, I think it is the best state in the Union.

I enjoy reading the views of the different sisters on taking care of children and getting along with husbands. Some are very amusing. I don't have any trouble keeping in harmony with my husband and I would not think of publishing my troubles if I had ever so many.

I want to mention one thing of importance about our children—their teeth! I've never heard a peep out of any of the mothers about them. Be sure the teeth are brushed at least once a day, especially after the permanent teeth are cut, and keep a close watch for that first small cavity which will soon be a big one, and have a reliable dentist fill it at once. If we would have the small cavities attended to at once we would soon run false teeth out of existence, to a certain extent. From my own experience I know it is our duty to keep our children's teeth in good condition and they will carry on the good work from force of habit, if for no other reason.

I am twenty-six years old and married to a good farmer Elmer. We have a boy and girl, Lyle, seven, and Lois, three years old. I am one who stands for farm life. I would not care to live in the city during these days of high prices.

Best wishes to all who read, and to Mrs. Wilkinson who must get tired of so much chatter.

BESSIE TRAIN.

Mrs. Train.—A long and heartfelt amen to all you have said about the care of teeth. That subject has been given more or less prominence in COMFORT at different times in the past and is well worthy of being taken up to a greater extent by every magazine published. That's how important I think it is.—Ed.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE TRIUMPH OF WILHELM MENCKE.

The week that followed the laying away of Bertha was one of the saddest that Violet ever spent; but she strove to put her own feelings entirely out of mind and devoted herself to the task of cheering and comforting the unhappy father.

She never failed to make her appearance at the breakfast table, clad in a dainty and becoming manner, while she tried to enliven the meal with cheerful conversation and by relating interesting items gleaned from the morning paper and other sources.

At dinner time he always found a tiny vase, containing some fragrant flower, beside his plate, while Violet invariably had some pleasant plan to suggest for the evening.

All these little attentions to his comfort were very soothing to the sorrowing man, and it is not strange that he now regarded Violet as the light of his otherwise desolate home; and it can readily be imagined how like a thunderbolt her proposition to go away to find employment elsewhere finally burst upon him.

"Go away, Violet!" he repeated, grasping her hands, his face growing white with pain. "I should be desolate! I cannot spare you! No, no, you must not leave me."

"But, Mr. Lawrence," Violet gravely returned, as she gently released her hands, "I have no duties, no regular employment now, and I cannot—must not live in idleness."

"No duties—no employment!" he repeated, sorrowfully. "How can you say that when you do so much to cheer me and brighten my home?"

"I am very glad if I have been able to contribute ever so little to your comfort," Violet answered, flushing with pleasure at his appreciative words; "but, as I said before, I must not be idle, for—I have my own living to earn, and though I know you are very kind and would not mind giving me a home, yet it is not right, and I ought to seek another position."

"Come here and sit down—I want to talk with you," said Mr. Lawrence, placing a chair for her; then taking another near her he continued, gravely: "I do not need to tell you that I am a lonely old man—I do not need to remind you that my last object in life has been taken from me and I have nothing to look forward to in the future but the care of the wealth which I have amassed, and which I hoped and believed was going to contribute so much to the comfort of the dear child whom we have just laid to rest. It—this wealth now seems almost a burden to me, since I have no one with whom to share it. I have no relatives that I know of, excepting a cousin of whom I used to be quite fond in my youthful days; but I lost sight of her years ago, and have never been able to find her—she, perhaps, is also dead, and if I should be taken away, all that I possess would have to pass into the hands of strangers or be given to some charitable institution. Now, my dear child—and you have become very dear to me, you have won a large place in my heart by your unvarying kindness to my afflicted little girl—you also are alone in the world, and why will you not remain with me and take Bertha's place, so far as possible? Be to me a daughter in her stead, and let me, in return, provide for your future? Violet, do not leave me in my sorrow and loneliness—give me a father's right to care for you while you can do much to brighten my home with your presence, your youthful life and cheerfulness, and especially with your music which has been such a solace to me of late. Will you, my child?"

His appeal was both earnest and eager and Violet knew that he meant every word that he uttered.

She believed, too, that it did lay in her power to make his life brighter and happier, while it was no light temptation to be offered such a home, together with all the luxuries and advantages which his wealth and care would provide for her.

Violet longed, with all the yearning of her own lonely heart, to give him the promise he desired. She was an orphan, homeless, friendless; there was not a person in the world that she knew of who possessed any genuine affection for her, or upon whom she could rely, except this grand and noble man, who was a comparative stranger to her, yet who attracted her as she had seldom been attracted toward any one. It was truly a very alluring proposition, yet something seemed to hold her back—there was an instinctive shrinking within her from an obligation so onerous.

She could not have told, however, whether it was simply pride, resenting the idea of receiving such bounty from one whom she had known so short a time, or a feeling of independence, which prompted a desire to support herself.

"What shall I do in this great house, with no child and no object to live for," Mr. Lawrence went on, a note of keen pain in his voice, as he saw no signs of yielding on her part—"with only my housekeeper and servants for companions? What shall I do in this great world without a relative to feel any interest in me or give me a word of sympathy or comfort? Perhaps you may not realize this feeling of desolation as I do, in your youthfulness and enjoyment of life; but it is no light thing for a man to be left entirely alone at my time of life. Violet, I will have the necessary papers drawn up tomorrow, if you will only give me leave, and you shall at once become and be publicly introduced as my daughter and future heiress."

Violet lifted a flushed and troubled face to him.

She could not bear that he should suppose, for a moment, that she wanted his money.

"But that would not be right, Mr. Lawrence," she said. "If you should ever learn that this cousin, of whom you were so fond, was living, it would seem unjust that I, who am of no kin to you, should succeed to property which otherwise would be hers."

Mr. Lawrence's face lighted with a tender, genial smile at this evidence that there was nothing mercenary or avaricious about her.

"Well," he said with a little laugh, "if your conscience, which I have already learned is a very active and vigilant mentor, would trouble you on that score, I think I shall be able to settle the objection to your entire satisfaction. I will make my will, dividing my property equally—and such a division would make Mary Lawrence, if she is living, a rich woman—half to become my adopted daughter's at my decease, the other half to go to my cousin or her heirs, if she or they can be found."

"I wish you were not a rich man, Mr. Lawrence—if you were only poor now, I would gladly remain with you and be just as good a daughter as I know how to be," Violet returned, with pathetic wistfulness; "but——"

"Oh! so you would like the obligation to fall entirely upon me! Isn't that a trifle selfish, Miss Huntington?" her companion inquired, meekly, but with a roguish twinkle in his eyes.

"But I have so little to give you, and you offer me so much," said the fair girl, with a sigh, but flushing at his way of looking at the subject—she had not thought of it in that light at all.

"You can give me what no amount of wealth could purchase, Violet," Mr. Lawrence responded, gravely. "You have been giving me during these days of sadness, what no money could pay for—a bright and cheerful presence at my table, when I have been lonely and dispirited; numberless sympathetic words and little comforting atten-

MID-WINTER COOKERY

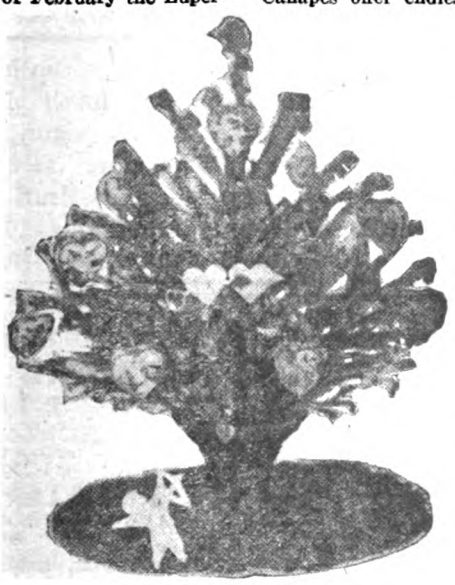
LINCOLN JELLY.

TO VARY THE DIET AND SUSTAIN THE APPETITE

By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

Suggestions for St. Valentine's Day



THERE is something very impressive about the fact that we still observe St. Valentine's Day, for it was in the year 270, on the 14th day of February, that this saint suffered martyrdom for his good deeds in aiding the Christian martyrs. There was an old-time custom in Rome to celebrate in the month of February the Lupercalia, a festival in honor of the heathen god Lupercus. It appears to have been after the death of St. Valentine that certain pagan elements of these festivities came into disfavor, and it was through the pastors of the early Christian church in Rome that in place of the Lupercalia a new festival was celebrated and named for St. Valentine because of his deeds of love and charity to all mankind. That we today celebrate St. Valentine's Day with messages and gifts to those we love, but proves once again that the good liveth forever.

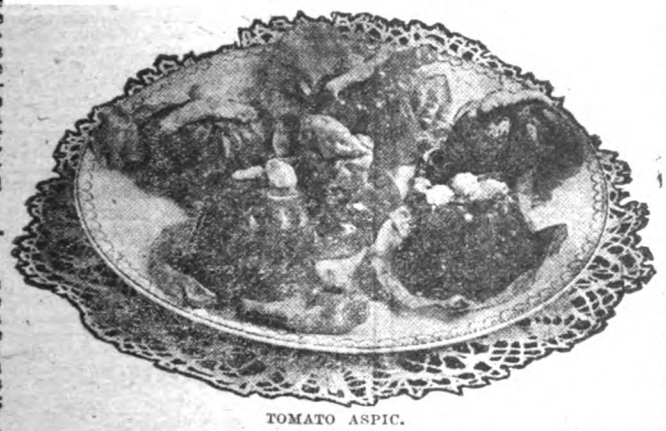
In the year 1775, in a publication called the "Connoisseur," appears "A Girl's Valentine Charm" as told by herself and while the recipe it contains is not what we would indulge in more than once a year, it is humorous, which is my excuse for repeating it here in our cooking department:

"Last Friday was Valentine's Day, and I'll tell you what I did the night before. I got five bay leaves, and pinned four of them to the four corners of my pillow, and the fifth to the middle; and then if I dreamt of my sweetheart, Betty said we would be married before the year was out.

"But to make it more sure, I boiled an egg hard, and took out the yolk, and filled it with salt, and when I went to bed ate it, shell and all, without speaking or drinking after it."

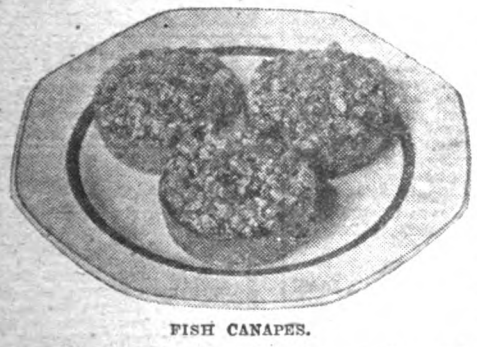
A pretty and novel idea is the valentine bouquet. Bring from the woods one or more thick ends from evergreen branches, arranging them into round, compact shape. Decorate with paper hearts made from gilt, white and red paper, and within the twigs hide sweets of various kinds. This can be made into an attractive centerpiece and contain a valentine for each member of the family and invited guests.

VALENTINE BOUQUET.



Mid-Winter Cookery

There always comes a time in winter when monotony in the variety of foods we have been serving seems unavoidable; the "taste" seems lacking and appetites lag. So with this fact in mind, I will suggest a greater use of cranberries, canned tomatoes, onions, cheese, and the making of more canapes which give a relish and starts the appetite for other foods.



Cranberries in winter time make up in no small degree for the absence of the fresh fruit acids which we have in summer and fall. They should be used freely, and a pie, half cranberry and half apple, baked with strips of pastry in place of a whole upper crust, is very appetizing. The raw cranberries will keep for weeks if well rinsed in cold water, put into preserving jars, then filled with cold water to overflowing and sealed. Keep in a dark cool place.

The canned tomato in winter is of great value in the diet, as to a certain extent it counteracts the effects of eating too much starchy food and meat.

Onions are available at most any season, and of all the vegetables that can be kept on hand there is no other that retains so much of the quality of a fresh vegetable. That onions are wholesome, there is no doubt. They contain flesh-forming elements, are soothing to the mucous membranes, and are otherwise medicinal.

TOMATO ASPIC.

FISH CANAPES.

Cheese should be eaten more than it is. In winter it can be kept indefinitely, and in instances where fresh meat is unobtainable, cheese may be eaten as a substitute as it contains tissue-building material, and when compared with foods of a similar composition, it is found that at the same cost, more nutritive material can be bought in cheese than in any other body-building food. Cheese stimulates the appetite, and, like all concentrated foods, must be thoroughly masticated, and as with meat, eaten with potato and other vegetables, bread and sweets. When cheese is eaten in any quantity, pastry and other fats should be used sparingly.

Canapes offer endless ways of preparing left-overs into appetizing and "tasty" combinations. They might well be called "appetizers." Try them.

Recipes

BAKED BEAN CANAPES. Two cups of cold baked beans mashed fine and mixed with one well-beaten egg, two tablespoons of tomato catsup, one cup of very fine bread-crumbs, and enough of the bean juice to form a soft paste. Season highly with pepper and salt and add some cold boiled onions if on hand. Stir well, press into a tin and bake in a moderate oven. about fifteen minutes. Have ready hot buttered toast, spread thickly with the mixture and serve.

FISH CANAPES.—Put one onion chopped fine and as much finely chopped celery into a stew-pan with two cups of boiling water and cook slowly until tender. There should be about one cup of liquid when done. Add to this one cup of rich milk and when it boils, slowly add two tablespoons of butter and two of dry flour that have been previously stirred to a smooth paste. Season with salt and pepper and cook slowly for five minutes, and then add about two cups of cooked fish that has been picked fine with a fork. When at the cooking point, serve on rounds of hot oven toast. Tuna fish is excellent to have on hand for this purpose.

SARDINE CANAPES.—Boil eggs hard and mash yolks to a paste seasoned with salt, pepper, and lemon juice, or a liftle vinegar from pickles. Add to this as much again of sardines and mince all together. Put white of eggs through food chopper. Butter half-inch slices of bread and spread with the mixture, sprinkling the top with the chopped egg white.

COTTAGE CHEESE BY GOVERNMENT METHOD.—Take one gallon of sweet skim milk and stir in three fourths of a cup of sour milk. Raise the temperature in hot water to 75 degrees, using a dairy thermometer. Remove from heat and place where it is to remain until set. Add one eighth of a junket tablet thoroughly dissolved in four tablespoons of cold water; stir while adding. Cover with cloth and leave from 12 to 16 hours in even temperature of about 75 degrees. There should be a slight whey on the top, and when poured out the curd should cleave sharply. Drain through cotton cloth, not cheese-cloth. When whey has been drained out, work in one or two teaspoons of salt to the cheese, according to taste; one and one half to two pounds of cheese should be obtained from a gallon of milk.

Note: 75 degrees would be about a "tepid" heat.

BOILED ONIONS.—Remove the outer skins. Cover with boiling water and cook until tender. The water in which onions are boiled should not be changed while cooking as by so doing valuable body-salts are lost. It is best to let the water boil down and thicken it with a little paste made from mixing together equal parts of dry flour and butter. Season with pepper and salt.

BAKE ONIONS by first preparing as above, putting into serving dish, covering with buttered bread-crumbs and browning in a hot oven.

ONION SOUP.—Slice or cut fine one onion to each person to be served. Cover with boiling water and cook until soft and creamy, adding more water if necessary. Add enough rich milk to allow of one cup of soup to each person. When it boils slightly thicken with flour mixed with a little cold water. Cook five minutes slowly. Season with salt, pepper and butter, and just before serving add to each plate one tablespoon of whipped cream.

ONION AND POTATO SCALLOP.—Peel and slice thin, four medium-sized potatoes and two onions. In a baking dish put a layer of potato, a layer of onion, dot with butter, sprinkle with salt and pepper, and dredge lightly with flour, or bread-crumbs may be used instead. Repeat the layers until all is used and then cover with milk. Cover the dish and bake in moderately hot oven one hour from the time it begins to simmer. Do not fill dish within two inches of the top, and do not allow it to boil. Uncover the last fifteen minutes to brown. A grating of cheese over the top is delicious.

TOMATO ASPIC.—Stew one-quart can of tomato with one bay leaf about twenty minutes and then strain. Have one heaping tablespoon of gelatin soaked in quarter of a cup of cold water until soft and add to the boiling hot tomato with some onion juice, and salt and pepper to taste. Pour into individual moulds and set to harden. The tomato should be cooked until when strained it will be fairly thick. Arranged on lettuce leaves and topped with bits of cheese gives an appetizing flavor.

TAMALE PIE.—Put one pound of good lean meat through the food chopper and sear it brown in beef fat. Pour over one cup of boiling water, set on back of stove, cover and simmer slowly until tender. While this is cooking, chop three small onions fine and brown in beef fat; add one quart can of tomato, one rounding teaspoon of chili powder, and two green peppers if obtainable; if not, use black dry pepper. Salt to taste and cook slowly about half an hour. Make a corn-meal mush with one cup of meal, two teaspoons of flour, half a teaspoon of salt and two cups of boiling water. Mix the drys with one cup of cold milk and gradually add to boiling water. In the bottom of a baking dish put one half of the mush, and stir the other half of mush with the tomato sauce and cooked meat. Put the mixture over the mush and bake fifty minutes in a slow oven. Served with good bread and butter, this makes an excellent one-dish meal.

SCALLOPED TOMATOES.—Crumb two cups of bread fine and moisten lightly with melted butter. Cook one quart of tomatoes about twenty minutes. Put crumbs and tomato in layers in baking dish, reserving some crumbs for the top, season each layer with pepper and salt, a scraping of onion juice, and bake thirty-five minutes in a hot oven.

TOMATO SAUCE.—Grate one carrot and slice thin one onion; fry in a little rendered beef fat fifteen minutes, keeping it stirred. To this add two cups of canned tomato, and simmer fifteen minutes and strain. Thicken with three even tablespoons of flour made smooth in a little cold water; add a dash of cayenne pepper, one tablespoon of strong vinegar from sweet pickle, or some good table sauce, a pinch of salt, and simmer 20 minutes. Excellent with omelet, sweetbreads, hashes, fish, etc.

TOMATO BISQUE.—Stew two-thirds can of tomato until it will strain easily, add a pinch of soda, and strain. In a double boiler put one quart of fresh milk and bring to a boil. In a sauce-pan put two tablespoons of butter and when it bubbles add two even tablespoons of flour and rub smooth. Add part of the hot milk to this, and when smooth pour it into the double boiler with the rest of milk; cook fifteen minutes. Just before serving, add one even teaspoon of salt, a pinch of pepper, butter twice the size of a walnut, and the boiling hot strained tomato. Served with cubes of bread browned in the oven.

TOMATO SOUP.—One quart of tomato, three cups of water, half an onion and one carrot chopped fine, four whole cloves, half a teaspoon of sugar, and half a bay leaf boiled gently until the carrot is soft. Strain. Melt three tablespoons of butter, rub in two tablespoons of flour and slowly add some of the soup, and when smooth put all together and simmer fifteen minutes.

Why Pearly Teeth Grow Dingy and Decay

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

You Leave a Film to Mar Them

Millions know that teeth brushed daily still discolor and decay. This is the reason for it:

There forms on the teeth a slimy film. You can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. Brushing in the usual way leaves much of it intact. It may do a ceaseless damage. And most tooth troubles are now traced to film.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Film-coated teeth are cloudy and unclean. So dental science has for years sought a way to combat film. That way has now been found. Able authorities have proved it by careful tests. And leading dentists all over America are now urging its adoption.

We Now Apply Active Pepsin

This film combatant is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And a 10-Day Tube is being sent for home test to everyone who asks.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

Only lately has this method been made possible. Pepsin must be activated and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has now discovered a harmless activating method. And that method now enables us to fight that film with pepsin.

The results are soon apparent. You can see them for yourself. The 10-Day Tube which we supply will show. Get it and know what clean teeth mean. Cut out the coupon now.

That Double Chin

THERE'S more to a chin than you can see in your mirror, unless you are wise enough to view yours from every angle. Many of us who confront a perfectly respectable chin each morning when we make our toilet are shocked one day to have a graceless young nephew say, "Why, Aunt Inez is getting a double chin!"

"What?" we cry, and rush to the mirror, but we find no sign of any such calamity. Still that nephew of ours sticks to his assertion, and one day, as we sit in a comfortable chair reading, we find our eyes looking into a nearby mirror, and for the first time we discover that nephew was right.

THIS POSITION WILL EVENTUALLY RESULT IN A DOUBLE CHIN.

A double chin may come from the accumulation of fat, from sagging muscles, or—and here's the point, girls—from unlovely postures of the head.

The way to hold a chin is slightly elevated and a trifle forward. Then the skin is drawn tight and the line of the chin is sharply defined. If, instead, the chin is drawn in and dropped down, only the luckiest of us can escape the suspicion of a double chin.

Remember this, and keep the chin lightly lifted, without any straining or evidence of the effort. It is defeating our purpose—that of looking attractive and making the most of our good points—if we give the impression of working hard to create an effect. Nobody is really beautiful who looks conscious of the fact or who seems to be trying to appear beautiful.

In reading, do not follow the example of the pretty girl in our illustration, and put the book on a table, bending over it to read. If you do, a double chin will result. She hasn't one now, but just wait ten years! To read, lean back comfortably in a chair, and raise your book to a convenient level, dropping the eyes, but not the chin.

To keep down superfluous flesh under the chin, it is a good thing to practice neck-stretching exercises daily, lifting the chin slightly, then turning the head to look over the left shoulder, then to look over the right shoulder, then bending it back as far as it will go, then rotating the head upon the shoulders.

Dash cold water on the throat every time you bathe the face. This has two advantages—it keeps the skin drawn firm and tight, and it protects you against colds.

Study your profile, girls, in your mirror, with the chin lifted and with it dropped, and see for yourself just how you should hold it to get the best silhouette—then stick to that pose.

Answers to Questions

AN ANXIOUS KID.—I am extremely sorry to have to answer your question in just the way you do not want me to but when you question as to how you may dye your hair a dark brown, I must say, "Don't!" Not at all because there is anything wrong about wanting one's hair a different color, but merely because it is a difficult thing to do—so difficult that unless it is done by a professional who knows just how to go through the process, the result is apt to be something terrible. And, once dyed, there is no going back on what is done. If your hair should turn a greenish purple, it would have to stay that color, and then how dreadful you would feel, wouldn't you? I had a friend once, a very wealthy woman, who lived in Paris a great deal of the time. Her hair was beginning to turn grey, so she had it dyed at one of the most expensive and careful places in Paris. Later she came back to America on a visit, and going to one of our big Western cities, where ever so many things were to be done in her honor, she immediately had her hair shampooed. What was her horror when the hair dried to see that it had turned purple. Some chemical in the soap acted upon the chemical in the dye and produced this frightful color. The beauty shop people where this occurred re-shampooed the hair, rinsed it, tried everything, but the purple still remained. She had to return to her hostess's in a taxi and with her head concealed beneath a thick veil, and for the length of her stay in that city, she had to remain invisible to anybody but this friend. Word was given out that she was ill, and all the dinners and dances and theater parties which had been arranged for her were cancelled. She left for New York City in a compartment car, had her meals sent in to her, and went immediately to the best professional dyer in New York upon her arrival. After this she never had her hair shampooed except by her own maid and with a preparation furnished by the shop which dyed her hair. But, my dear, you and I haven't maids, and we can't travel in compartment cars across country to get our hair re-dyed when it does not look as it should. So why risk getting ourselves into such an awful mess? Home-dyed hair is almost inevitably the most awful failure, and the cause of many heartaches. Your hair may not be the color you wish, but at least it isn't purple or green as it might be after you tried to dye it. Why not shampoo it with great care at least once in two weeks, brush it every night gently but persistently, and practice dressing it becomingly? There is hardly any hair that won't respond to this treatment by taking on more life and color, and becoming good to look upon.

VIRGINIA.—It is against the rules of the department to answer by mail, so let me tell you here what to do about your hair. I am sorry it takes some time to give an answer to all the letters which come to me, but I know you will understand. It is quite likely that if you are only seventeen, your body has been pretty severely taxed by the growing-up process the past few years and hasn't had much surplus life to give to your hair, but you certainly ought to be able to produce better results now. First, let me remind you, as I am so often doing in these columns, that the hair depends upon the health of the entire body. I judge that typhoid fever pulled you down in strength somewhat and that you are not yet as robust as you might be. Well, make it your task to build yourself up. Go at it with a will, and keep at it every day. Eat plenty of good sensible food three times a day, but not between meals, drink quantities of water, sleep eight or nine hours every night, see that your eliminative functions are kept normal. Bathe daily, have fresh air in your room at night, and get as much outdoor life as you can. Eat plenty of fruits. Exercise! Now with the assurance that you are going to do all these things, let me suggest some specific things which will help your hair. First, investigate to see whether the scalp is tight to the skull or moves easily back and forth. If it is tight, right there is one trouble, for the blood cannot circulate freely if scalp and skull are bound together. Get to work to loosen the scalp. Do this by nightly massage, which is the best kind of tonic for the hair. It is a good idea to dip the fingers very lightly in olive oil before beginning the massage, although a dry massage is also excellent for the scalp. Loosen the hair, brush it gently, and shake it, then slip the palms of the hands with the fingers held close together, under the hair on each side of the head. Now, pressing against the scalp with the finger-tips flattened, move the scalp back and forth upon the skull. Do not lift the fingers or rub them back and forth upon the hair. After a moment of this, change the position of the fingers and repeat, and so continue until every portion of the scalp has been gone over thoroughly and is in a glow. Sleep with the hair hanging loose or loosely braided. Never brush the hair hard, but gently, and do not use a wire brush on your hair as it is apt to roughen the scalp. Also be careful in the use of a comb, which should be called into action only to comb out tangles gently, never to touch the scalp itself. Shampoo your hair once in two weeks, using a Castile or good white household soap, shaving it in hot water and letting it dissolve until a milky liquid is formed. Pour this on the head in shampooing—never rub soap on the scalp or hair. Be sure to rinse thoroughly many, many times, and dry the hair, when possible, in the sun. Here is a hair tonic which is recommended, and which you might use, although the thing you must get straightened out first of all is your general physical condition. Gain a few pounds of flesh, a few degrees of color in your cheeks, and see how quickly your hair will begin to improve.

A Good Hair Tonic

Castor oil, 80 grams; bay rum, 80 grams; tincture of cantharides, 10 grams.

To apply a hair tonic, use a medicine dropper and part the hair, running the dropper down the part, then parting again, do the same, until the whole scalp has been reached. Follow by a gentle massage as before directed. Good luck to you!

BLUE EYES.—A good hair tonic is given in the answer just above. As to the remedy for hair on and under the arms, which will not let it come back—I am sorry I can't give you such a formula. If I could, I should be rolling in wealth, for every woman wants just that. The best treatment of which I know for superfluous hair is the French method—dampening the hair with ammonia one day, and with peroxide of hydrogen the next day, letting the liquid in each case dry on. This will kill the hair in time, and it bleaches it during the process, so that it is really not greatly noticeable. For a quick removal (the peroxide and ammonia is a slow treatment), I can recommend the following for under the arms, but not for the arms themselves, as the hair will certainly come back. Under the arms it does not matter, because you can take it off again, and the part is not plainly visible at any time. Here is the formula:

To Remove Superfluous Hair

Equal amounts of sulphate of barium and cornstarch. Add enough water to make a spreadable paste. Apply to spot and let dry. When dry, scrape off with the blunt edge of a silver knife or of a paper knife—the hair will come off with the paste. But, remember, it will return again, and you should not use this depilatory on face or arms.

THIS IS THE LOVELY WAY TO HOLD THE CHIN.

NORTH DAKOTA.—Yes, you weigh somewhat too much, but it should not be a hard matter for you to reduce a few pounds. You are probably very fond of candy and other sweets. Cut them out for a time, and do not eat much potato or rice or macaroni. Do not eat fat meats or gravies, pies or cake. There will be plenty left to eat—any kind of lean meat, fresh vegetables, fish, poultry. And don't eat too much or between meals. The "little holes" in your face are enlarged pores. Be more careful in your diet, and you will help this condition as well. Also, do not use hot water often on your face, and when you do use it, always rinse afterward first in warm water, then in tepid water, and finally in cold water to close the pores. Using powder fills them and is apt to cause blackheads and pimples.

Be Careful What You Wash Your Hair With

Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali, which is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo, for this is pure and entirely greaseless. It's very cheap and beats anything else all to pieces. You can get this at any drug store, and a few ounces will last the whole family for months.

Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in, about a teaspoonful is all that is required. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy, and easy to to handle. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.

or any form of transportation has also soared to mountainous heights, and that the nickel which in the eyes of the average man is supposed to purchase anything and everything under the sun from a steam yacht to a toothpick, is now worth from two to two and a half cents, the average man still insists that his body must be carried seventeen miles for a depreciated nickel, just as it was years ago, unmindful of the fact that in the days of yore he was drawing $3.50 a day and is now pulling down $8 or $10. If Mr. Average Man can't have his body hauled around the universe for five cents, he starts to tear up the tracks or chase the street cars out of the city. Then in comes the jitney and charges him twice or thrice as much as he paid the street cars and for a day or two he smiles with delight to think he is driving a corporation into bankruptcy. After two or three weeks he begins to count his money and jitney excitement palls. He figures out, maybe, that he had better have paid the extra cent the companies asked to save them from going broke, than go broke from paying for risky rides in squeaky, unheated flivvers. Then the sober second thought prevails as it ought to have prevailed at first, and the street cars are invited to return, and Mr. Ford's musical boxes are, for the nonce at least, relegated to the dump. Vernie, from your letter, it seems to me you are trying to still further complicate the transportation problem. You want to ride horseback to school and travel in the car at one and the same time. Now riding to school on a horse inside a street car may afford you lots of excitement and give the poor gee-gee a much-needed rest, but what about the passengers? Think of their poor toes if Mr. Horse started stepping on them as he undoubtedly would. Think, too, if there be a fat lady in the car and Mr. Horse takes a notion to sit in her lap, and if while he's taking his ease and she's taking her squeeze, he observes a dignified gentleman seated opposite with long white whiskers and he mistakes these whiskers for a bale of hay and starts to devour them, then you'll be sued for a million dollars damages, while all you can do is to send the poor man a bill for a shave. I advise you, Vernie, either to ride on horseback to school or go in the car, but don't attempt to ride and go in the car at the same time. Of course everybody ought to read COMFORT and join the League, and if everyone had the good common sense that you possess, Vernie, they would doubtless do it.

VERNON HILL, VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

How are you getting on? I am twelve years old, have light hair and blue eyes. I am four feet tall and weigh ninety-two pounds. We live on a large farm near South Boston. We raise corn, wheat and rye and many other things. We have a car. It is a Stewdbaker. Papa has a store. I can cook sew and take care of the children. I will come again soon. From your niece, CLEO POWELL.

Cleo, you ask me how I am getting on. Sorry to say I am not getting on at all, as a matter of fact, I'm figuring out where I am going to get off. I belong to that wretched, unhappy class of people, who have not only not profited by this war as most people have, but have been practically ruined by it. The world has suddenly discovered that it does not want brains, intelligence, soul or spirit. It simply wants its belly filled, just as the hog does. There is going to be no place in a state of society that is leveled down to a hog basis and soon even the hogs will get tired of it, and will look with horror on the havoc they have created. If I could only go out and pick coal, fry steel, load ships, make paper or set type and bind the books I occasionally sell, I'd have as swell a limousine as the gentleman who delivers our milk (not the farmer who produces it). It's tough when the man who sets the type for a book or prints it boosts his wages to such a dizzy height, that the man who writes and creates the matter that is being put into print has to crawl under the bed when the landlord comes. The Lord knows I want everybody to have all that they are honestly entitled to, but when one class starts to freeze and starve another class, and doesn't care a darn how many it kills so long as it gets what it wants, then we are worse than the Huns who turned Europe into a slaughter house. If Uncle Sam does not do something to regulate matters and see that those who have a right to live are allowed to live, then I'm going to complain to Officer Grogan on the corner and have Sam arrested, and you bet if Officer Grogan ever looks cockeyed at Uncle Sam, the old gent will get busy, for, though the Jews own New York, it is the Grogans who control it. After all, I won't complain to Uncle Sam. The intolerable conditions that exist and which will continue for years, are all due to the fact that thirty million men were withdrawn from constructive industry and forced to give the last ounce of their energy to making weapons of destructive deviltry. The world is flooded with fake money, a ton of which won't buy a lunch for a grasshopper. The world's cupboard has been swept bare and every strike tends to make it more barren. More work, more sacrifice, more production, more patience, more thrift, less extravagance, less ugliness, hysteria, discontent, and a broad and impartial view of world conditions, faith in our institutions—and God, with all the old-time American virtues, will pull us through. The world has been blown to pieces and millions have perished in the explosion. Now help, all you can, to gather up the pieces and stick it together again and don't blame Uncle Sam, Wall Street, Morgan, John Bull, France or Belgium for your troubles. That's old pro-German stuff that even the Huns don't believe in any longer. The gentleman who dynamited the world and who is responsible for all our troubles is one Bill Hohenzollern, occupation, woodchopper, residence, Holland. I can't quite understand about that car and the Stewdbaker. I know there are a good many bakers who have got stewed, and now I suppose, owing to prohibition and the scarcity of liquor, they have converted themselves into cars. One thing is sure, I would not care to have a stewed baker driving a car of mine. I suppose if the stewed baker ever sobers up there will be no more joy rides. It is time that the car was locked up for no one ever knows what a stewed baker will do. Papa must have his hands full taking care of a store and running a two-hundred-acre farm, and if Papa gets his hands full that's not living strictly up to the prohibition law. It's a tough job putting this prohibition law through, anyway. Even the ships that go up and down our bay are loaded, and if the whole country goes dry then the umbrella men will go broke and commit suicide. You have many accomplishments, Cleo, and I am glad you can cook and sew but don't cook the children as we shall need all we can get of them for the next great war, compared to which the last war will be a pink tea.

MIDDLEVILLE, MICH.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a boy eight years of age and I live on a farm of eighty acres. I have to large rabets. We raise quite a few pigs and in order to keep them from squealing my daddy has to husk corn by moonlight as well as by daylight. Sometimes I help him. I think it is fun. I live one half miles from school and our teacher's name is Miss Martain. We have 25 puplis at school. I have a brother and his name is Armand. If I see this in print I will write again.

Your little nephew, ALTON W. STIMSON.

Alton, it would do our hearts good if we could only see the large "rabets." What kind of animal are rabets, anyway, and to what use do you put them? Do you use them for pets, food, or to scare away the Bolsheviki, and how many acres does it require to hold one, let alone "to" (two) large "rabets"? In visions I see your poor daddy husking corn by moonlight in a vain endeavor to still the clamor of the pigs for more grub. The champion hog keeper is Uncle Sam. He has been husking corn for every variety of hog under the sun, but the more the hogs get, the more they squeal and the more they want. Uncle Sam has discovered that his farming methods have been all wrong and he is going to give the squealing hogs a new diet, at least he says he is (for Uncle Sam is such a good-hearted old softy you never can tell just how he is going to act). He is rounding up the squealing hogs and, instead of feeding them, his intentions are (if he does not change his mind) to kill off a bunch of them and ship the balance out of the country. That is the only way to treat overfed hogs who will insist on squealing and have made up their minds to eat us out of house and home and turn the whole country into one huge pig-pen. Uncle Sam has husked corn too long for these tens of thousands of disgruntled hogs and every time he has fed them they have tried to bite his hands. It is a shame that these hogs should be deported to other countries to do more squealing while others husk corn for them. If I had my way I would take them half way across the Atlantic or Pacific and then let them walk the rest. Then you'd hear some fine squealing in various languages. I am anxious to know about those 25 puplis you have in your school, Alton. Do you have to husk corn to keep them quiet, too, or do you just use a club? What is teacher trying to run, a dog pound or a school? Billy the Goat says that you mean pupils. We are greatly relieved to know that. We have too many disgruntled hogs of the two-legged variety and too many pups, but we can never have too many bright little boys of the Alton Stimson type. Miss Martain ought to be very proud of you, Alton, and if she isn't, your Uncle Charlie is, and if he were not scared of the "to" large "rabets" he would come out and help you put some of those hogs out of business.

LUNDY, N. C.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I live on a farm and go to school and am in the fifth grade. I can crochet and milk and do lots of housework. I can milk and sweep almost ever thing in the house. I have four brothers and one sister. One of my brothers is in Germany in the U. S. Army. He has been in the army for four years. I am the baby one at home. I hope you and Billy the Goat had a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. So I will close.

Your loving niece, GERTRUDE THOMAS.

Gertrude, you are a very bright, busy young lady, and I have no doubt your mother appreciates, even as I do, all your wonderful accomplishments as a housekeeper. Like most of my youthful correspondents, however, you did not put a single a in your letter. All your a's were o's. What the poor letter a has done, what terrible crimes it has committed, that it should be banished from the alphabet, I have failed to discover, and why o, which looks like a dumpling or a Salvation Army doughnut, should be so highly honored and so universally used, is more than I can comprehend. The Goat says it takes a little more trouble and care to make the letter a than is required in the case of the letter o. There you have it. All the woes of humanity have come upon us because we have preferred to be careless instead of careful. To be careful and to take pains to do things properly is the basis of all thoroughness and efficiency, and thoroughness and efficiency are the basis of greatness, genius and all that is best in life. Success in life consists in doing a multitude of little things and doing them well. To be careless is to be slobby and to be a slob is to be about everything that is repugnant and repulsive. The greatest of all our industries is the canning industry and yet our boys and girls don't seem to want to can, they all want to con, and people who go into the con business, sooner or later land in the pen. Boys and girls, show this letter to your teachers, it is they who are to blame, not you. Gertrude says she con, or rather can, crochet. I hope no canned crochet products will be sent to our boys who fought Germany, for our soldiers have suffered enough from German bullets in the front, without being crocheted in the rear. Gertrude, you are some housekeeper if you can milk and sweep almost ever thing, or everything as it should be, about the house. We are paying 20 cents a quart for milk of the cow variety. Now if you can extract milk from the parlor organ, the family sofa, chairs, tables, etc., there is a fortune in it for you and your conscience won't prick you when you get the poor, tired family cow out of bed just as she is indulging in her beauty sleep in the cold grey dawn of drowsy morn. You might send me a sample of parlor organ milk by parcel post and perhaps we can do business to our mutual advantage. I can't acquire any strength on even the most expensive grade of cow's milk but maybe if you could send me some lacteal fluid from the parlor organ I might get strength enough to go out and swat the stuffing out of the Bolsheviki, the I. W. W.'s and all the other pestilential cranks and rascals who are trying to turn this country into a nutty house. I hope your brother will soon return home safely. Comparatively few of our men have seen four years' service as he has done. Now mind the a's and don't forget the milk and let me hear from you as soon as possible.

DIXON, MISS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl five feet and a half tall, weigh 116 pounds, have brown hair and eyes. To anyone who guesses my age I will send my picture, it is between fourteen and eighteen. Will some of you come over and help me watch the cows? My sister and I have to mind them from father's corn and you may know it is some job as we have fourteen to watch. I had one brother in the army overseas. He was gone nine months and we never heard a word from him. He has returned now. Will someone please send me the song "Texas Cowboy" and "Nellie Gray."

Your niece, MAY PEARL BARNETT.

May, you inform us that your picture is between fourteen and eighteen. Fourteen and eighteen what? Why leave us in doubt on this momentous question? Sorry I can't come and help you make those cows behave themselves. It must be terrible having fourteen cows trying to step on father's corn all at once. If I were father I'd go around on stilts, sit on the roof or send for the police. It is bad enough to have one cow step on your corn, let alone fourteen. I am not quite sure, from the way you word your letter, whether father has fourteen corns that need watching and one cow, or one corn and fourteen cows. Anyway, it is a sad predicament whichever way you look at it. The Goat says maybe you refer to the corn that grows out in the field and not those that decorate father's toes. That, of course, is another matter. But I am sorry for a field if it has to have its corns trodden on. I should think the best remedy for your trouble would be to plant potatoes, or else raise chicken which can fly every time they see the cows coming. Maybe you could get Luther Burbank to invent a new variety of cow that is warranted not to step on father's corn, spoil his crops and dispense milk at ten instead of twenty cents a quart. Sorry you did not hear from your brother who went overseas for nine months. Probably

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL COMFORT READERS:

This is my third attempt to have my little bit added to your very interesting corner, and I am hoping that neither Billy the goat nor his brother get hold of it before it goes to print.

I enjoyed Criss's letter very much; she voiced my sentiments exactly. I should like to correspond with her, if she cares to. Also Elizabeth Wagner of Indianapolis, Ind. She gave no street address, and I was afraid that a letter addressed that way would not reach her. I also enjoyed "Comfort Reader's" letter. I should like very much to hear from sisters living in Colorado and the southern part of California, as I expect to take a trip out that way in the early spring, and should like to know what opportunities there are of getting a position. I have a very good place here, in the busy city of New York, that of a private secretary, but I long for the great outdoors, as I have read and heard so much about the great Golden West that I just can't wait for the day that I will be boarding the train that will carry me safely to "God's Own Country." I certainly will appreciate any information that the sisters will send me, and I will try and answer all letters received.

Perhaps you would all like to know what the writer looks like. Well, there really isn't much to say, as I dislike talking about oneself. I am somewhere between twenty-five and thirty, weigh about one hundred and thirty pounds, five feet four inches tall, Irish blue eyes and dark brown hair. Just full of life, love everyone that is good and sincere, and try to get the most and best out of life. If my letter passes the board of censors, I will drop in again sometime. I will leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson, and will more than appreciate her kindness in forwarding the letters to me.

Best wishes to all COMFORT's staff, and all COMFORT's readers.

MADGE.

Madge.—Through you I want to apologize to Elizabeth Wagner for omitting her address. It was unintentional and I regret very much the inconvenience it has caused her. She wishes me to explain that letters written to her and held at General Delivery were returned to senders after being kept the usual number of days, and that she will answer all letters in the future. Her address is 1812 Singleton St., Indianapolis, Ind. And speaking of letters reminds me that in a recent issue I asked for the address of Old Maid, which I accidentally destroyed (I'm a very careless person, I assure you), and received addresses of three "Old Maids," each claiming to be the one referred to. Now, what shall I do? —Ed.

MARYLAND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you allow a girl from this part of the state to enter your corner and sit down for just a few minutes? I call myself a girl although I have been married nearly four years and have a sweet baby boy just sixteen months old. He is walking but cannot speak a word. I am sending his picture, taken when he was seven months old, which you may use in COMFORT if you care to. His name is Edward William.

Best wishes to all.

PUG.

Pug.—Doubtless Edward William has it all reasoned out thus: "Why bother to talk when I have a perfectly good smile always ready?" We think he is a very nice youngster.—Ed.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

All Aboard for Saltair—All Aboard. Here we go! This is part of the residential district of Salt Lake City we are now passing through. This is the poorer locality, but it does not look very poor at that. There is very little poverty in Utah. That little stream of water we are passing over is called the Jordan River. It is fed by City Creek Canyon, and in turn empties into the Great Salt Lake.

Now we are out of the sage-brush land and that white substance you see on the soil is alkali dust and furnished Uncle Sam with potash during our struggle with the Huns, without which product our case would have been hopeless. We will see the Potash Plant further out.

This rather large pool is the "Black Slews." Wild ducks live here.

That white stuff piled up there in big heaps is the unrefined salt. The water of the lake is pumped out to the "salt fields" where it is run into the moulds, which are from two to three hundred feet long. The sun evaporates the water, leaving the salt crusted on the ground. Then more water is run and evaporated. When the mould is filled with salt, it is cut, piled on cars, and sent over to the refining plant. When it leaves there in bags, it is pure white and ready for the market. This brand of salt is called the Crystal Salt. Try it, sisters. It is said to be the saltest salt on the market. We never use anything else at home.

Now we are pulling in at the Saltair Beach. All off the train? Now, where do you want to go first? Bathing, did I hear someone say? Have you your suits and towels, and have you checked your valuables? Are you sure your cap doesn't leak, and have you a good supply of cold cream and powder, and a comb? Then run to your dressing-rooms and get ready. Unless you are awfully modest you will not wear stockings. I never do, and they are such a nuisance in swimming and besides the salt will eat the elastic supporters you wear and then your stockings will come off. But if you do wear them, make them cotton—the salt will eat the silk ones off your feet, it is so strong.

Don't you dare to dive! You will break your neck. That water is 37 per cent solids and 22 per cent of it is salt. You dip down until your shoulders are covered. Now you are not cold. Afraid to float? Come, Nelle Fischer, let's show 'em how. Just ease yourself backward, moving your arms forward. See how easy it is done. Your head reaches the water and your feet come up. Cross your feet and it will be easier to balance yourself. Keep up that forward movement of your arms, and you will glide along just like a rowboat. When you want to get up, draw your knees up under your chin, while pressing your arms backward and downward. See, you come up just like a cork bounces up when you have held it under water. Do you like to swim? I do. Now, put most of your weight on your feet, because, in salt water, your feet have a tendency to "sink" upward, where in fresh water they sink down. Do that overhand stroke, it is much less tiring. Let's all form a chain and float out toward Antelope Island. All right now, put your arms over my feet, and all hook on the same way. Ready, go. Backward arm movement everybody. Now, we are going at some speed. Can't touch the bottom out here, but don't need to, 'cause we can all float in if it comes to that.

Now we are all dressed and feeling fine; fresh and hungry. Which shall we do, eat at the Ship Cafe, or take "hot dogs" and soft drinks? I hear you say the latter.

A moonlight waltz? What could be more alluring than the dreamy, dreamy music played by that big band? Not much jazz to it, but good, wholesome music. There are pretty girls in light, summery dresses, and strong, healthy young men, "Utah's Product" all around you, seeming to float upon the air, they are so graceful. Utah is noted throughout the world for her pretty girls, and her manly, clean-cut young men.

Intermission at last. Let's try the new Roller Coaster or Giant Racer. You get in the red racer, and we will take the yellow one, and see who will beat. Up the steep incline we go, and now we are ready to go down that one hundred and twenty foot dip, built on an 80 degree incline. Did it take your breath going down, and give it back when climbing another one hundred and eight foot incline? Here is another dip, but not such a big one as the first. Racing, and isn't it fun?

Shall we go up to the Ship Cafe for some ice cream? Doesn't it look pretty—everything "ship shape" and everything white?

All aboard the steam launch for a thirty-minute ride on the lake. Hear the seagulls crooning? And can you hear the call of the wild ducks? Back again, and ready to go home. All the cars are filled with the dancers, all happy and all singing, pretty dreamy melodies. Now we are back in Salt Lake City, and I guess you want to know who your "traveling com-

New and Easy Way to Learn Music

Learn to Play and Sing in Spare Time at Home—Every Step Made Simple as A B C by Print-and-Picture Lessons That You Can't Go Wrong On

TRY IT ON APPROVAL

Entire Cost Only a Few Cents a Lesson—and Nothing Whatever to Pay Unless You Are Satisfied

HOW often have you wished that you knew how to play the violin or piano—or whatever your favorite instrument may be—or that you could take part in singing?

How many an evening's pleasure has been utterly spoiled and ruined by the admission "I can't sing," or, "No, I am sorry, but I can't play."

At all social gatherings, some one is sooner or later sure to suggest music. When the others gather around for the fun, the one who can take no part feels hopelessly out of it—a wall flower—a mere listener and looker-on.

Or those long and lonesome evenings at home, when minutes seem like hours—how quickly the time would pass if you could spend it at the piano or organ—or in making a violin "talk," or in enjoying some other instrument.

And now—at last—this pleasure and satisfaction that you have so often wished for can easily be added to your daily life.

No need to join a class or pin yourself down to certain hours for lessons or practice. No need to pay a dollar or more per lesson to a private teacher. Neither the question of time nor expense is any longer a bar—every one of the obstacles that have been confining your enjoyment to mere listening have now been removed.

My method of teaching music by mail—in your spare time at home, with no strangers around to embarrass you—makes it amazingly easy to learn to sing by note or to play any instrument.

You don't need to know the first thing about music to begin—don't need to know one note from another. My method takes out all the hard part—overcomes all the difficulties—makes your progress easy, rapid and sure.

Whether for an advanced pupil or a beginner, my method is a revolutionary improvement over the old methods used by private teachers. The lessons I send you explain every point and show every step in simple Print-and-Picture form that you can't go wrong on—every step is made as clear as A B C. My method makes each step so easy to understand and practice that even children only 7 to 10 years old have quickly become accomplished players or singers under my direction by mail. Also thousands of men and women 50 to 70 years old—including many who have never before tried to play any instrument or taken a lesson of any kind—have found my method equally easy. My method is as thorough as it is easy. I teach you the only right way—teach you to play or sing by note. No "trick" music, no "numbers," no makeshifts of any kind.

I call my method "new"—simply because it is so radically different from the old and hard to understand ways of teaching music. But my method is thoroughly time tried and proven. Over 225,000 successful pupils—in all parts of the world, and including all ages from boys and girls of 7 to 8 to men and women of 70—are the proof. Read the enthusiastic letters from some of them, which you will find printed at the left—samples of the kind of letters I am receiving in practically every mail. My file contains thousands of such letters. Largely through the recommendations of satisfied pupils, I have built up the largest school of music in the world.

But I don't ask you to judge my methods by what others say or by what I myself say. You can take any course on trial—singing or any instrument you prefer—and judge entirely by your own progress. If for any reason you are not satisfied with the course, or with what you learn from it, then it won't cost you a single penny. I guarantee satisfaction. On the other hand, if you are pleased with the course, the total cost amounts to only a few cents a lesson, with your music and everything included.

When learning to play or sing is so easy, why continue to confine your enjoyment of music to mere listening? Why not at least let me send you my free book that tells you all about my methods? I know you will find this book absorbingly interesting, simply because it shows you how easy it is to turn your wish to play or sing into an actual fact. Just now I am making a special short-time offer that cuts the cost per lesson in two—send your name now, before this special offer is withdrawn. No obligation—simply use the coupon, or send your name and address in a letter or on a postcard. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit.

HOME-MADE VALENTINES

By Paula Nicholson

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett Pub., Inc.

IT is very easy to make valentines at home and these dainty trifles are often much more acceptable than more expensive valentines that are bought in the stores, added to which the home-made varieties are generally useful, while the ready-made valentines are no earthly good to anybody once they have served their original purpose. Little girls especially enjoy making these valentines for their friends or perhaps for mother or older sister.

NEEDLE-BOOK—OPEN.

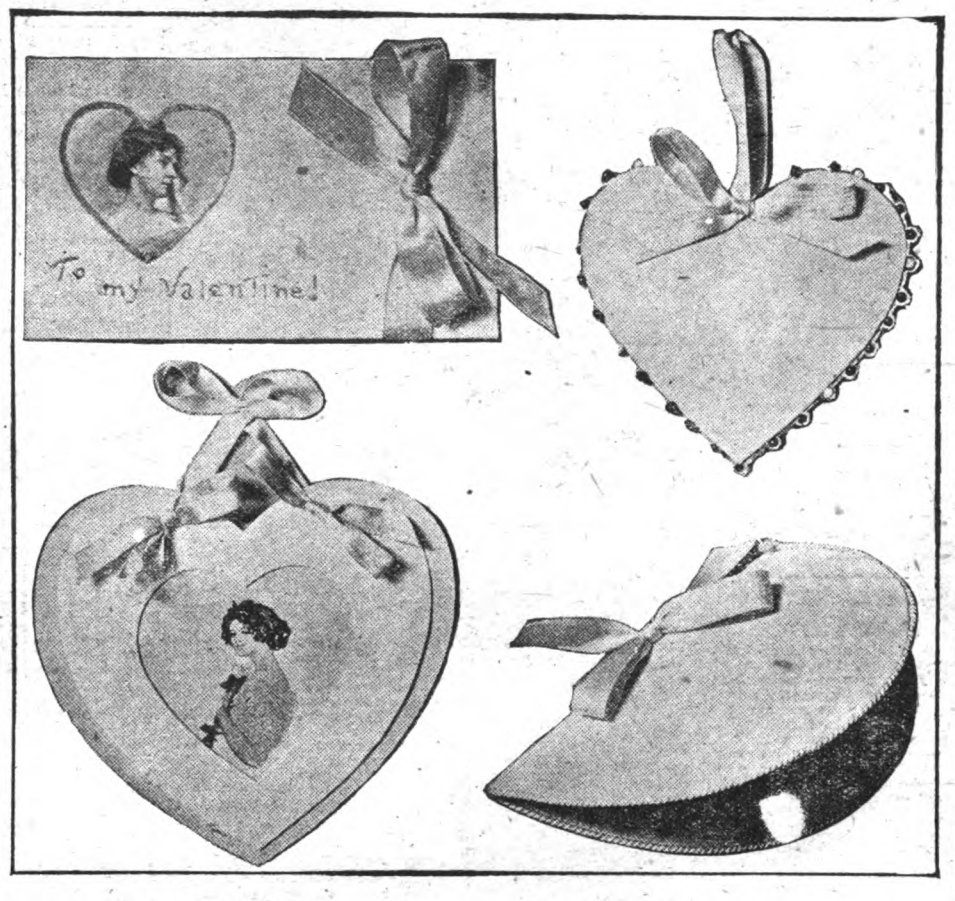
Mothers will most appreciate the heart needle-book shown on this page, which is made by cutting two hearts from cardboard. Three inches broad by two high is a useful size, but of course they can be made larger or smaller as desired. It is best to cut a pattern out of stiff paper before you cut into your cardboard. This pattern can then be folded in the center and the sides trimmed exactly alike until you have a perfect heart shape to cut by. Taking a little precaution in this way prevents the valentine from looking lopsided as hearts so often are when carelessly cut out. Cover each of the heart-shaped pieces of cardboard on one side with a bit of pretty silk, a piece of thin velvet, or even challie, satine or silkaline or best of all a bit of pretty cretonne. Put these covers on firmly, but not quite as tight as usual in articles of this kind, for these little hearts must be bent in the center as the needle-book folds over. The edges should be overhanded together and it makes a very neat finish to sew a cord on the edge as shown in the illustration. The leaves of the book can be made of white flannel or better still of pink or pale blue flannel if you have it. This is fastened in by baby ribbon through holes pierced in the cardboard.

Another easily made but very effective valentine is the heart-shaped frame shown in the large picture. First a large heart should be cut from cardboard. Either the brown or the gray-toned board that is sold for mounting photographs is ideal for this, but if you cannot conveniently get this, the cover or side of an old pasteboard box will serve, provided there is no printing on it. Cover this with crepe paper or paste on a piece of wall paper with a pretty flower. Partly covering this, there is another heart of white or tinted cardboard cut out in the center and glued at the top and bottom, but leaving a place through which a photograph or picture can be slipped, or if you prefer a pretty colored picture cut from an old magazine can be pasted in the larger heart and the white frame pasted right on top of this. A pretty ribbon at the top serves to hang it on the wall.

The tiny heart-shaped sachet makes a dear little valentine to slip in an envelope and send to a distant friend with a note of good wishes or even with that letter you have been so long owing. Any girl or woman would be very glad to get such a dainty little trifle to wear just under the blouse or to slip in the front of the corset, for everybody complains that the new low-cut corsets, especially if they have elastic tops, press into the body uncomfortably. But if a small flat pad is placed just under the top of the steels in the front this trouble can be overcome. This little valentine remembrance is just the exactly right shape to remedy this. It is made by cutting in heart shape two layers of cotton wadding with violet sachet or orris powder or any odor of sachet preferred scattered between the layers. This is covered with two heart-shaped bits of silk or satin. Embroider one of these pieces with a tiny design of forget-me-nots in pale embroidery silk or mercerized cotton. Overhand each side of the sachet together and as a finish trim with a tiny crocheted scallop or a bit of narrow val lace.

SMALL SACHET VALENTINE.

Another sachet illustrated is much larger, but just as useful in its own way. This is made of cretonne, silkaline, figured silk or satin and is intended to place in the top bureau drawer to scent the veils or handkerchiefs. It is very simple and easy indeed to make, but very pretty and acceptable for all that. About six inches wide by six from the top of the lobe to the tip of the point of the heart is the usual size, though, naturally, it can be as much larger or smaller as anyone wishes. It is lined with cotton wadding just like the tiny sachet described above. From four to six sheets of wadding are generally used for the purpose and sachet powder is sprinkled rather thickly between the layers and narrow lace is fulled slightly between the two sides when they are overhanded together. Trim the top with a bow.



A valentine that any child can make is to take a small envelope of thick white paper and cut a pretty picture from a magazine. Make the picture heart shaped if possible. Glue around it the narrowest gold cord that comes or carefully make a border around it with a colored pencil or gold paint and print or write underneath, "To my valentine." Tie a pretty ribbon in a flat bow at one end and nail it to the one loved best.

Heart-shaped pincushions are not new, but they are just as useful as they ever were and exactly the thing to send to a girl's "best fellow." The prettiest are made by covering two heart-shaped pieces of the ever useful cardboard with a pretty bit of silk, satin or cretonne, but red silk, satin or velvet are decidedly the most appropriate for valentine purposes. These are overhanded firmly together and a ribbon hanger is sewed in at the top, and a row of alternate white and black pins stuck all around the edges.

VALENTINE BLOTTER.

Then there is the Valentine Blotter which is very quickly put together by cutting two or three pieces of blotting paper of any color preferred, in heart shape and making for these a cover of the shape of stiff white paper. With a fine brush paint a narrow border on this of gold paint and letter it as illustrated "For my lady fair," or "For my best friend," if it is intended for a man, or it can be lettered simply, "To My Valentine."

CRANBERRY SAUCE.—Pick over and wash one quart of cranberries, put in an agate-lined saucepan with two cups of sugar and one cup of boiling water and cook without stirring for twenty minutes. Keep closely covered.

CRANBERRY RELISH.—Cut one pint of cranberries in halves, cover with cold water and soak about ten minutes. Drain. Cut one orange in halves and scrape out the inside, being careful not to get any of the white. Chop half a cup of raisins fine. Put all together with one quarter of a cup of good vinegar, and one cup of sugar, and cook until thick. Add a pinch of clove, one quarter of a teaspoon of ginger and one teaspoon of cinnamon, and cook a few minutes longer.

CRANBERRY PIE.—Line deep pie plate with a thin crust. Cut cranberries in halves and fill plate. Mix thoroughly one tablespoon of flour, and a pinch each of cinnamon and ginger with one cup of sugar and spread over cranberries. Over this grate a little orange rind, and add bits of butter. Put inch-wide strips of pastry across the top about one inch apart both ways to form squares. Bake in a moderately hot oven about forty-five minutes.

CRANBERRY ADE.—Squeeze the juice from cranberries by first putting through the food chopper. Add cold water and let stand a few hours. Pass through cheese-cloth bag. Sweeten with a syrup made from granulated sugar, or with honey. Add water, about two thirds as much as there is cranberry juice. This is very wholesome.

LINCOLN JELLY.—Cook one slice of red beet in two cups of water until a bright red color is obtained. Strain through cloth. Return to fire and when boiling add two tablespoons of gelatine which has been previously soaked twenty minutes in one cup of cold water. Stir until dissolved. Add to this one half cup of lemon juice and one cup of sugar. Stir until dissolved and strain. Pour about two inches deep into an agate-lined baking pan. When firm, cut into oblongs; the proportions of a flag. To produce the effect of stars and stripes, put boiled frosting which has not been cooked quite to the point of "threading" into a paper cornucopia and press through a small opening in lines on the jelly, leaving a square at the upper left-hand corner to be filled in with dots of the frosting. Served on white lettuce leaves, it is very decorative.

"You had a friend, a Mexican girl?" he inquired.

"Tonita Morales—yes, yes!" answered Beryl, clasping her hands convulsively.

"Well," went on Trenwyck, "Miss Morales has taken refuge in a house on Sutter Street. It is my house," he added unblushingly, "and I told Miss Morales that I would try to find you. She has good news for you, Miss Grayson."

"At last, at last!" murmured Beryl, in tearful gratitude, lifting her eyes above.

Hope had opened the closed door of her emotions, for this stray gleam of joy seemed to promise fulfillment of her dearest desire. Tonita had sent for her! No doubt her "good news" had to do with Neil.

"Will you go with me?" asked Trenwyck insinuatingly.

"Without a moment's delay," replied Beryl. "Heaven will reward you for lifting a poor, forlorn girl out of her black despair."

She arose to his side and accepted the support of his proffered arm; then, together, they left Portsmouth Square. Trenwyck kept his eyes on the moving form of Gorsline, and there was another who kept her eyes on Trenwyck and the devoted Beryl—following them as steadfastly as they followed the ruffian in the lead.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE HOUSE IN SUTTER STREET.

It was strange that, on that first awful day of the shock when death stared the whole city in the face and women knelt in the streets and implored the Most High for mercy, iniquitous men could think and plan and execute for their own selfish ends. Yet, let it be borne in mind that such an opportunity for crime had never before come to the wicked in that great and ruined metropolis.

Greed was the mainspring of action in both Trenwyck and Gorsline. The unprincipled lawyer was to gain by separating Beryl from her heart's love; a proud and haughty family was to pay him his price for the fiendish work, even as was the wretched Berdyne in case the lovely prize should fall to him. As for the inhuman Gorsline, he had eyes for nothing but the priceless gem with which Neil had sealed his marriage vows.

There were no blue-garbed infantrymen to interfere with the brutal scoundrels as they proceeded in the carrying out of their dark designs. The smoke of fires eating at the city's heart was already hovering in the air, and the detonations of dynamite came fitfully from the region east of Sansome Street. San Francisco's doom was written in livid characters, for the trade wind had set in and was fanning the flames westward. And through it all these two unprincipled men, in the hope of gain, continued to weave their web of deceit about the destiny of the pure and helpless girl.

Constantly watching the swiftly moving form of Gorsline, Trenwyck led Beryl along Sutter Street and into the deserted house through whose door the gangster had flitted like an evil spirit. In one of the front rooms, whose appointments had been marvelously well preserved, the lawyer asked Beryl to be seated until he could go and bring Tonita.

Trembling with joy and her sweet face flushed with hope, Beryl dropped wearily into a chair. Trenwyck went out, and in a rear apartment held a whispered colloquy with his confederate.

During his first visit to the abandoned mansion, Gorsline had surveyed it pretty thoroughly. He now brought this knowledge to bear, and, as a result of the colloquy, the lawyer returned to Beryl, and the gunman fled up a rear stairway. In a chamber on the second floor he secured three or four sheets, which he twisted into ropes; then he stole down again, glided into a noble apartment luxuriously furnished as a library, and secreted these gathered materials. Next he sat out, on a table in the dining-room, some cold viands he found in the pantry, a silver pitcher half filled with water, and a decanter of wine. This work completed, Gorsline secreted himself.

Meanwhile, Trenwyck, with his lying face and false tongue, had returned to Beryl.

"I am very sorry, Miss Grayson," said he, as though deeply grieved, "but your friend Miss Morales has gone out herself to look for you."

A sharp cry of dismay broke from poor Beryl.

"All the rest of my family have fled from the house," went on Trenwyck, plausibly, "and only one servant is left. This servant tells me, however, that Miss Morales said she would return in an hour or so, and requested that if I was happily successful in finding you and bringing you here, you should wait until she returned."

"I must wait," said Beryl, resignedly, "for there is nothing else I can do. Besides, I am too weary to take another step."

"I am very sorry," pursued Trenwyck, "that some of the female members of my household did not remain, but they are all at our country place in Montery by this time. However, if you will accept of my hospitality and accompany me to the dining-room, I can offer you what food we have."

"Could you tell me, sir," returned Beryl, "what news Tonita has for me?"

"If I am not mistaken," answered the artful lawyer, "she said something about a Mr. Neil Preston. This gentleman, as I understand, is seeking you, and has appointed a rendezvous somewhere in one of the parks. Miss Morales, I believe, is to take you to him."

A half sob of joy broke from Beryl's lips.

"Oh, my darling, my darling Neil!" she murmured. "Is he well?" She reached up and caught one of the lawyer's hands with convulsive eagerness.

"He must be well, Miss Grayson," answered the crafty lawyer, "or he would not be able to look for you. But, come! May I conduct you to the dining-room?"

Fresh strength ran pulsing through her tired body. A wild joy had seized upon her heart, and she was disposed to think lightly of her present trials in view of the happiness that apparently lay before her.

"You are more than kind to me," said Beryl, starting up. "Will you tell me your name? I wish to remember it with gratitude till my dying day!"

"Percival," he answered, with an insinuating smile.

The girl's ravishing beauty, which had become radiant under the touch of hope, aroused something in his nature which he had never experienced before. He recalled Berdyne's exalted praises of Beryl's loveliness, and he now saw that, extravagant though they seemed, they had failed to do the subject justice.

Trenwyck envied Neil Preston the love which he had won, and he did not wonder that Berdyne should move heaven and earth in his attempts to gain so beautiful a prize.

In the dining-room, Beryl ate of the food set forth by Gorsline. The water, although too warm and insipid, she relished as a draft from the springs of paradise. No refreshment had passed her lips since Neil had halted the automobile at the wayside resort the night before. She would have none of the wine, although Trenwyck urged her to drink of it. The lawyer himself drank glass after glass, and his eyes brightened and his face reddened with his potations.

And outside the doom of the city was creeping stealthily and relentlessly onward. Yet poor, deceived Beryl, the half-intoxicated Trenwyck, and the greedy Gorsline seemed to think of nothing connected with their perilous situation.

"I think," faltered Beryl, troubled at the recklessness which was growing in the lawyer's manner, "that I will go back to the other room, Mr. Percival."

"Certainly, Miss Grayson, certainly," said Trenwyck, thickly, starting to his feet. "This room," and he walked unsteadily to a door and threw it open, "has suffered less from the earthquake than any other room in the house. You can wait there for your friend—quite comfortably."

"Thank you," answered Beryl, a vague fear rising in her breast as she caught the open and insolent admiration in Trenwyck's eyes.

In that moment a swift intuition of danger would have sent her flying from the house, but for her cherished hope of meeting Tonita. To go forth into that desolated city again, drifting to and fro with the aimless tide of refugees, and abandoning Tonita and her darling husband, was not to be thought of. She steeled herself to remain where she was, and passed into the library.

Trenwyck followed her.

"You are weary," said he, pointing to a broad leather divan. "Take a little rest, my fair one, and be assured that I will watch over your slumbers until—until your friend comes."

The boldness of his manner increased. Beryl stole a look about the rich apartment. Books were scattered over the floor, and the massive furniture had slid about into unwonted places. A white bust of Shakespeare hung half over the edge of a bracket. The windows had fallen out, and, as the library was on the first floor, she felt that those windows were so many avenues of escape in case she found it necessary to flee.

"You have been most generous and kind, Mr. Percival," said she, as calmly as she could. "Will you not continue to be so? Pray leave me for a little—I can rest better if I am alone."

"Jove!" muttered the lawyer, his eyes smoldering like coals. "You are beautiful as a houri, my girl. I do not wonder that you have turned the brains of men like Preston and Berdyne, or——"

A scream broke from her lips.

"Berdyne! What do you know of Berdyne?"

Her hands leaped to her heaving bosom, and she wondered if again—again she had been deceived! No, no, it could not be! She was there to meet Tonita, and Tonita would take her to Neil. If this hope were blasted, she felt that she must die.

"Oh, leave me, leave me!" she cried, frightened by the lawyer's manner.

"Not yet, my enchanting little beauty," he answered, starting unsteadily toward her. "If you will give me a kiss—only one——"

"Never, never!" she screamed, retreating before him.

It seemed as though he would accomplish his purpose in spite of her. But at that moment, as though the angels of innocence themselves had flown to her protection, the floor heaved beneath them, and the walls rocked. Many shocks had followed the great cataclysm throughout that momentous day, and this one, while far less severe than the first, was sufficient to jar down a few toppling walls.

The white bust on the bracket fell, and just at the moment Trenwyck was reaching forth his arms to grasp Beryl about the waist, the bust struck the half-tipsy lawyer on the shoulder, and bore him to the floor.

Beryl turned to gain the unglazed opening that marked the place of one of the windows. Before she could reach it, another man ran in.

"Fool!" shouted a husky voice; "you've tipped our hand now, an' spoiled everythin', for all I know. Get out o' here, if you're sober enough. Go an' find Berdyne!"

Beryl caught one glimpse of the fierce, lowering visage of Dave Gorsline. The next moment she was seized roughly, and hurled into a chair.

CHAPTER XVII.

NEIL'S DREAM OF HOPE.

Neil, heartsick at the workings of fate which had prevented him from finding his lost darling at the ruined rectory, hurried off in the direction indicated by the soldier. Poor, wandering Beryl was somewhere within a few blocks of him, but ah, how helpless he was to go directly to her, or to acquaint her with his presence in that part of the city! Like one demented, he raced through one desolated street after another, gazing staringly at all he passed, halting now and again at places where refugees had gathered, to call her name. Only a mocking silence greeted his cries, and at every step pitiless fortune seemed at war with him. Yet ever and always he kept repeating to himself, with the grimness of despair: "I will find her! I will find her!"

He seemed to have been made the sport of circumstances. Had he hastened a little faster on his way from the Mechanics' Pavilion, had he not been turned aside so many times by the soldiers, he would have reached the dismantled house in Pine Street in time to meet his dear one, to kiss away her tears, dispel her wild doubts and lead her to safety. How his spirit writhed with the thought of what a few minutes had denied him—and her. Still, "I will find her, I will find her!" he muttered through his tense lips, and kept relentlessly on.

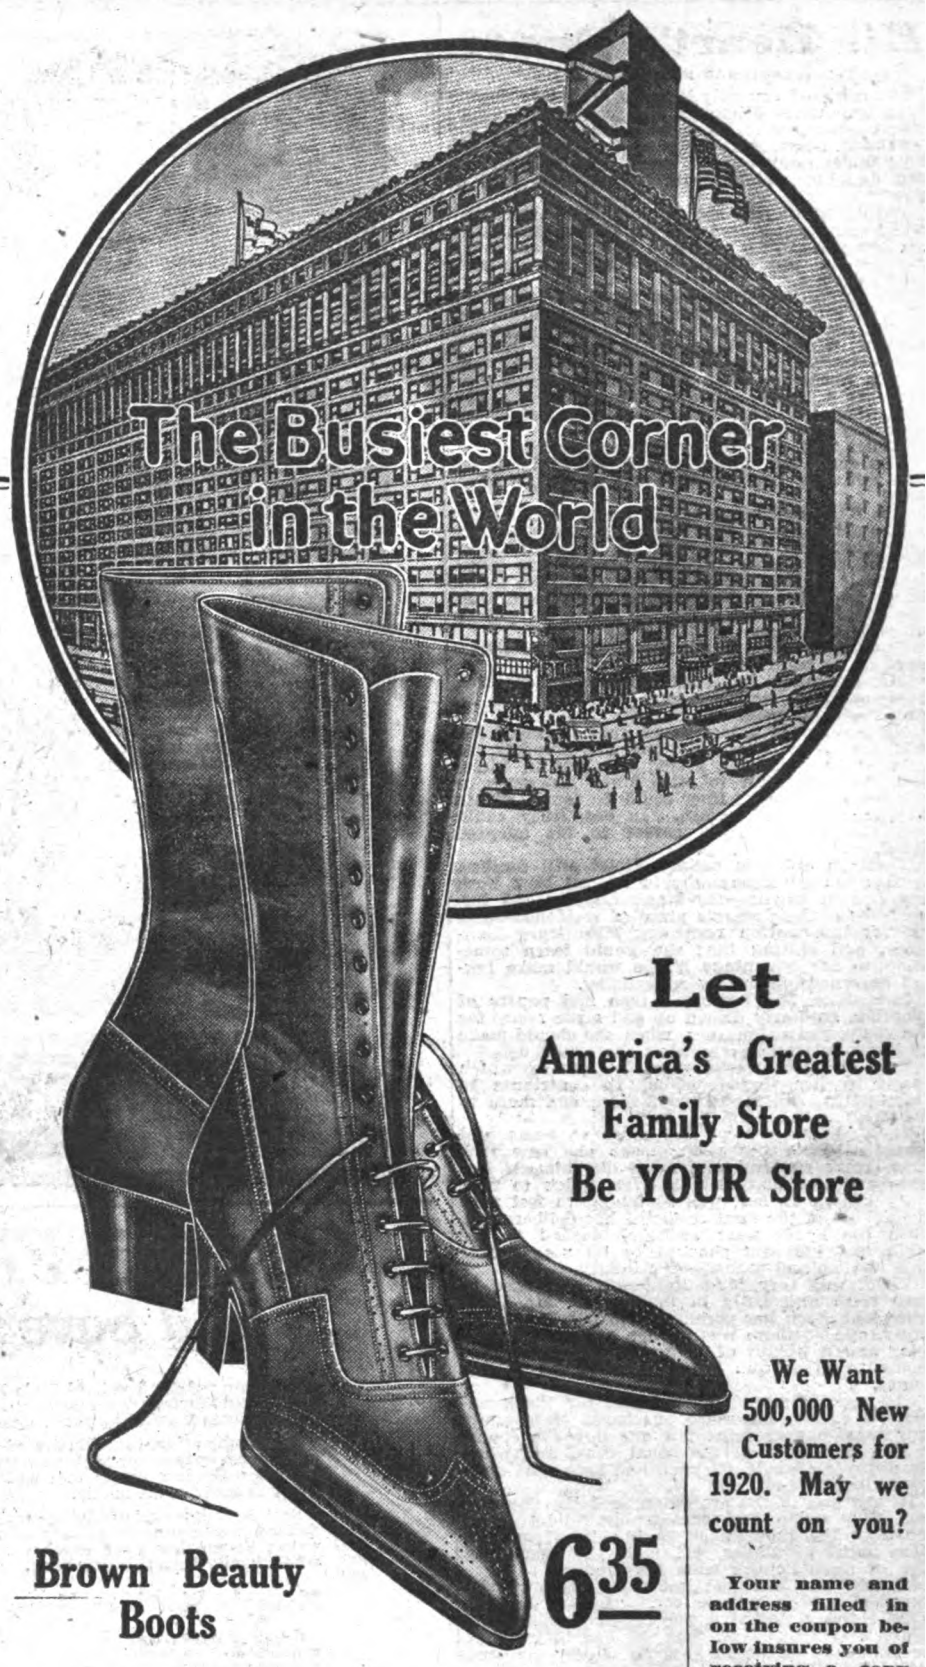
He had scarcely slept since Irma Lee had sought him out, and told him that his sweetheart was at Sunset Ranch. Tuesday had been a day of happiness, of sorrow, and of unremitting action. Tuesday night, unceasing vigilance had been demanded of him in guiding the Red Flyer. And now Wednesday—that fateful Wednesday!—was calling upon him for his keenest faculties, his greatest energy, and he felt endurance failing under the strain.

His injury did not claim a single thought. In fact, the wound did not pain him in the least. His only pangs were those at his heart, and a sort of insensate fury because brain and limbs should rebel at a time when they were needed most.

His fruitless search brought him finally opposite a small store which had not yet been abandoned by its proprietor. He had no heart for food, yet knew that he must eat if he would revive his strength, so he filed into the dilapidated shop with others of the famished refugees.

Everything was free. One had but to help himself from the shelves, taking whatever he could find.

"Hurry," urged the proprietor; "it won't be long before the fire gets here, and then everything will go up in smoke."



The proprietor of that little grocery store was a rare spirit! He even joked as he pointed out the food most suitable for the homeless and wretched ones to whom he was giving his stock. Somehow, the cheeriness of the man heartened Neil wonderfully. Neil was but one of thousands upon whom misfortune had descended heavily that day!

While the grocer's kindliness revived Neil's drooping spirit, the rough-and-ready fare exerted a wholesome influence on his waning strength. When he left the place it was with hope renewed.

He passed among the Orientals who had taken refuge in Portsmouth Square; he even halted for a space beside the very spot at the foot of the Stevenson Memorial from which Beryl had been conducted by Trenwyck. Near him stood two men, Americans. One was grizzled and gray, his hands horny and seamed with toil. The other was of fifty, or thereabouts, with a refined and intellectual face. The first carried a small tool box, such as carpenters sometimes use, and the second held in his hands a Boston bag.

"I was worth half a million this morning,"

tions, which I can only liken to the lovely flowers that sometimes bloom at the foot of a glacier; sweet songs, that have been like balm to my wounded heart, and—but why enumerate? Do you understand what I mean, and will you be my daughter, Violet, and let me take care of you?"

"How good you are to me, Mr. Lawrence," she began, gratefully; but the look of perplexity on her young face still told him that she could not see her way quite clear, even yet to answer as he desired.

He sat thoughtfully silent for a few moments, then he said, with great kindness and gentleness:

"Do not feel that you must decide the matter tonight, Violet. Take a little time to think it over—a week, a month even, if you wish; only try to remember while you are considering that there is a lonely, anxious man awaiting a verdict, which will mean a great deal to him whichever way it is rendered."

Violet was relieved by this suggestion.

She could not decide now if forced to do so. She felt that her answer must be in the negative.

Oh, if he had never asked her to be his wife!

She could not readily forget and learn at once to regard him in the light of a parent, when he had so recently declared himself her lover. Had that declaration never been made, she would never have thought of such a thing, and thus she could easily have stepped into a daughter's place in his home.

Thus the matter rested for a time, and things went on as before.

Mr. Lawrence appeared much more cheerful, however, and was secretly confident that he would win his point in the end.

So assured of this was he that he made his will that very week, dividing his property, as he said he would do, giving one half to Violet and the other half to Miss Mary Lawrence or her heirs, if she or they could be found within a year after his decease. In case they could not, the whole should revert to his adopted daughter.

Then, in order to satisfy Violet still further, he inserted advertisements in several New York and Boston papers—for Massachusetts had formerly been the woman's place of residence—asking for information regarding Miss Mary Lawrence, and stating that she would learn something to her advantage if she would make herself known to the party advertising.

This done, Mr. Lawrence then had papers of adoption, regularly drawn up and made ready for the young girl's signature, when she should make up her mind fully as to what she would do.

Two or three weeks went by, during which Violet by her tireless efforts to contribute to his comfort, endeared herself more and more to the lonely man.

She, too, seemed to feel more at home and contented with her position, as she saw how much more cheerful and more like himself Mr. Lawrence was becoming, and he, quick to note every change in her, was beginning to feel very hopeful as to the final result of her deliberation, when his hopes were suddenly dashed to the earth and his soul shocked to its very center by a terrible and unforeseen calamity.

Violet was very fond of flowers, and liked to have them constantly in the house. Mr. Lawrence had given her permission to purchase more freely, and so there was always a spot of bright color and a breath of fragrance in the various rooms to greet him when he returned to his dinner.

She usually sent the coachman for them, unless she or Mr. Lawrence purchased them while they were out driving; but one day she forgot to give her order at the usual time, and when she did remember it, the man had been sent upon some other errand.

It was late in the afternoon, and the day had been very damp and cloudy, but Violet could not bear the thought of having Mr. Lawrence come home to dinner and miss the customary vase of fresh flowers from his table.

"I will run out and get them myself," she remarked to the housekeeper. "I have had no exercise today, and it is not far to the florist's."

Mrs. Davis remarked that she had better wait for John—he might be back in season—or send one of the other servants.

"I know Mr. Lawrence would much prefer to miss the flowers than to have you go out in the wet and cold for them," she said, in conclusion.

But Violet insisted that she would like the walk, and said she would not be long. So, robing herself in a long, warm ulster, and donning her sealskin cap—Mr. Lawrence's Christmas gift to her—she tripped away to Johnson's, only a few blocks distant, to get the coveted flowers.

The walk did her good; the air was raw and cold, it is true, but her blood was young and warm, and her cheeks glowed, her eyes were brilliant from her exercise when she reached the florist's.

There were several customers ahead of her, and she had to wait some time before her order could be attended to.

At last, however, her selections were made, and she hastened away.

She was surprised to find how dark it had grown as she came out upon the street, where a fine, cold rain that was almost sleet was falling; but the young girl hurried, only eager to get home and have her flowers arranged before Mr. Lawrence's return.

She did not mind the rain very much, for she was well and strong, but there seemed to be a heavy fog with it, and her heart beat faster than usual with a sense of fear at being out alone on such a night.

She had retraced about half the distance when, just as she was about to pass a narrow passage that led between two tall buildings, a strangely familiar voice called out appealingly:

"Violet! Violet, wait a moment. I have something to say to you."

Her heart leaped into her throat, while her face grew white and almost rigid with sudden fear of some impending evil.

But she involuntarily slackened her pace, or, rather, her limbs seemed to fail her all at once, and the next moment she saw looming up before her, out of the darkness and fog, the huge proportions and coarse visage of Wilhelm Mencke.

"What are you in such a tearing hurry for, little sister?" he asked, in a tone which he tried to modulate affectionately, as he turned and began to walk along with her.

"It is late, and I am anxious to hasten home," Violet panted, nervously.

"It is rather late, and a nasty night, too, for a girl like you to be out alone," her companion remarked, as he peered more closely into her face.

"Please do not detain me, Wilhelm, or I shall not get back in time for dinner," she urged, tremulously, as she began to quicken her steps again, and growing more and more frightened in his presence.

"You might let dinner wait a few minutes, it seems to me, for the sake of doing an old friend a good turn," the man said, in a reproachful tone.

Violet's sympathetic heart was always touched by the troubles of others, and even though she both feared and loathed her brother-in-law, in his present condition, she could not turn away from his appeal.

"What can I do for you?" she asked. "Do you want some more money?" and her hand sought the pocket of her ulster and drew forth her purse.

"Well, it's rather humiliating to confess it, little sister," Wilhelm Mencke returned, with a disagreeable laugh, "but I am rather hard up, and a little money would help me out amazingly."

Violet thought that the quickest way to get rid of him would be to give him what he wanted, so she stopped and began to unfasten her purse.

"Tut, tut, Violet; don't show your money on the street; some thief may be on the watch," her companion added glancing about him, with an air of suspicion; but he was not on the lookout for thieves, as will soon appear.

"Just let us step around this corner where it is a little more quiet, then you may give me a couple of dollars, if you please."

She followed him without thinking whither he was leading her, her only thought was to give him the money he asked, and escape from his disagreeable companionship as soon as possible; she did not even notice at first that a closed carriage was standing near, its door wide open, while the driver sat upon his box, his reins gathered up as if just ready to start.

Wilhelm Mencke led her close up to it, remarking that she could "see by that coach lantern as the street light was upon the opposite corner, and it wouldn't take but a minute to find what she wanted to give him."

All unsuspicious of any design upon her personally, Violet bent forward to count him out the money, when he suddenly gathered her slight form in his arms, leaped into the carriage, shut the door, and clapping his great, fat hand over her mouth, to prevent her screaming for aid, they were driven rapidly away in the darkness and thickening fog.

Violet struggled and fought desperately to release herself from the vise-like grasp of her captor; but without avail, for she was like a child in his clutch, while every now and then, as they passed a street-light, she caught a glimpse of his face—more bloated and revolting than ever in its close proximity to hers, and saw that it was gleaming with a look of evil triumph.

"I have you at last, Vio!" he chuckled, as he caught her terrified glance. "It has been a long and tedious watch—thought I should never catch you out alone; but I guess I'll get paid for it in the end. Now," he added, as she continued to struggle for liberty, "you may just as well be quiet and peaceable, for you cannot get away. You don't seem to enjoy a fond and brotherly embrace, eh? Well, all you have to do is to promise that you will be mum, and make no effort to attract attention, and I'll let you go. Will you?"

Anything would be better, Violet thought, than to be crushed against his breast in that rough fashion, with the hot fumes of his beer-laden breath beating upon her face, and she nodded her head to signify that she would make no outcry.

"Honor bright?" questioned her captor, cautiously, before letting her go.

She nodded her head again, and he instantly released her; but a smile of triumph lighted his face as he realized that at last he had snared his bird.

He had been prowling about in the vicinity of Mr. Lawrence's residence when Violet started out for her flowers, and felt that his time had finally come. He followed her to the florist's, then seeking a carriage-stand near by, he engaged a hack, the driver of which he knew and had partially engaged for a service of this kind some time previous, and directed that it should be driven a little way down the quiet street before referred to, and wait there until he came with his "game." Then he returned to the florist's, waited until Violet came out, when he followed her as far as the alley, and then accosted her as related.

NEBRASKA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

In a recent COMFORT there appears a letter from a little girl signing herself "Milly" who thinks a few words from C. A. M. of Neb. will be of help to her in working out her life's problem. So, such as they are, they are gladly given and with a prayer that she may find peace, soon. I think it depends entirely upon what was in her heart at the time the promise was made. If she thought overwork caused her mother's illness and if she believed that she would not again be ill if she were to do the bulk of the work; and made the promise with the thought in mind that she would renounce marriage merely that she might assist her mother in the raising of the smaller children; and those children are now grown up and the mother not in actual need of her help, or that there are now other girls that can take her place helping mother, then I think her promise has been fulfilled and it no longer binds her. If on the other hand she made the promise with the thought of sacrificing herself as a sort of peace offering, without any reservations or limit, then I fear God would be no more pleased to have her break her word, than she would should her lover make her a promise merely to gain her and then after a few years were to say: "Well you are now mine and I no longer need keep my vow." However, she is foolish to let her younger sister snub her. Younger sisters are very prone to do that very thing to a sister that has always given up everything to them and it will be a little hard to break her of it, but it can be done and for her own self-respect and the good of the sister, it must be done. Simply take your own rightful place and what is your share of everything, and do very little explaining or talking about it. God does not want any of us to be unhappy, and neither does He desire us to let others clean their feet on us, even though He did teach us to be humble and take the lowly places. There is such a thing as being too lowly and not only hurting ourselves but those we minister to as well. Why not go to the best hair dresser in town and tell her that you want her to fix your hair in the most becoming style for your face; and then make her try it several ways and after she gets one that suits you, you can dress it yourself that way. It will take a little of your time, and also the folks will probably make a few remarks but what of it? Some way, to know you look well gives a person confidence in themselves and it will not be long before you will discover that you are as happy as can be and also will find that there are so many things to do in this world that you will not find the time to grow old, and even though you never should feel free to break your vow to God, you need never grow into an "old maid" and should you like to write to me directly you may ask Mrs. Wilkinson for my ad-

The Pest and His Valentine

by Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett Pub., Inc.

I NEVER see the store windows blossoming out with valentines and love-tokens but what my thoughts turn to my own romance which culminated on St. Valentine's Night.

I often insist that I proposed to Harvey while he insists that I did not, so the question is still a mooted one.

But to go on:

I never saw the necessity of seeking a husband merely for the sake of getting married, for I was earning more than many men I knew. And so, to discourage possible admirers, I always assumed a more or less suffragette air to warn them away, for I was among the species most of the time, being stenographer and quasi-private secretary for the manager of a commission house.

In spite of this, the men tried to get into my good graces now and then, and started with small gifts and invitations to dinner and to the theater, but I always managed to squelch them with such finality that they never repeated.

But some men will not take "no" for an answer, and when Mr. John Reeves, bachelor, forty-eight, fairly good to look at and wealthy enough to keep an automobile, came around, I found I had met my match.

Had he been about twenty years younger, I might have considered him, for I was already twenty-four myself, but as it was, I didn't want to marry my father—nor anyone for that matter.

Mr. Reeves persisted in his attentions despite all my frowns and squelchings. Really such devotion should have been rewarded—but it wasn't.

At first I was amused, and then worried when I couldn't do anything with him, and when he finally did propose, I refused him with a blunt: "I should say not!"

Evidently he was expecting the answer, for he laughed and said that all girls refused, at least once, the men they married, and that he wouldn't take "no" for an answer.

How was I to get rid of him? At last, in desperation, I determined to fib outrageously and tell him I was already engaged.

And I did.

"But you're not wearing a ring," he replied.

"I know it, because my engagement is a secret. He's a soldier and I don't know when he'll come back and even when he does we'll have to wait until he saves enough before we can marry," was my answer. "He isn't rich, you know," and growing quite sentimental over my imaginary soldier, I daintily dabbed my eyes with my handkerchief.

It didn't deceive Mr. Reeves at all, for he sniffed as he retorted:

"Funny. Most of the boys are back. But if he's in the army and you're going to wait until he saves up enough from his soldier's pay, why you might just as well make up your mind to die an old maid."

"Nevertheless, I'll remain true to him," I replied belligerently.

"What does he look like?" continued my tormentor.

What did my imaginary soldier look like?

And then Harvey St. John came to my mind. I had known him from school-days, and the St. Valentine's Day when he sent me a gorgeous love-token, all gilt paper, lace and celluloid, and built on the sky-scraper plan so that when you straightened out the little tabs, the whole valentine looked much like a wedding cake, I decided that he was mine. And apparently I was his, too, for I give as a testimony, this verse printed on his offertory:

"This valentine comes
From a heart that is true,
Faithful and loving Forever—to you."

But since those days, we were just friends, and while he was in France doing his bit as a doctor in the medical corps, I had corresponded with Harvey in the frankest, friendliest way, just as if I had been a man who through some inadvertency, had not been able to go to the front.

Why not describe Harvey to my persecutor?

"Well," I began, after a little hesitation, "he is tall and has a splendid figure." (I took a naughty satisfaction in this because Mr. Reeves is short and inclined to be fat.) "He has dark hair, cut quite short except on top which he wears in such a fascinating wave." (Mr. Reeves was a trifle bald.) "And when he's in uniform—ah!" I breathed romantically.

Mr. Reeves evidently felt that he suffered by comparison, for he retorted:

"I wouldn't trust a soldier that's handsome enough for the movies. Anyhow, I'm going to cut him out and I'm going to call on you some evening."

"You'd better not," I warned.

"Oh, yes, I shall," he answered, as he left.

I supposed he would. Now what should I do? I had thought that after I told him I was engaged, he'd quit the field. Not he.

I determined I'd be out whenever he called, but that didn't work for he came around every night for a week, which decided me to let him call if it would do any good.

In this exigency, I happened to meet Harvey. Of course, he wasn't in France; he had returned about nine months since and was already practicing.

"Why this sour-pickles expression?" was his greeting.

"I'm in trouble. The fact is, Harvey, I'm pestered to death by an old—yes, I'll say it!—an old fool who thinks he's in love with me. He comes to the office during the day and camps around the house at night. I told him I was engaged to a soldier in the hope of getting rid of him, but it didn't work."

"Why don't you get a soldier to come and pose as your lover then, and bear out your story?"

"I can't because I've described you," I wailed.

"Well, then, the next time that chap calls, call me up on the 'phone. I'll don my uniform and play my part."

"Oh, how splendid of you!" I exclaimed in delight and I caught his hand in mine. Harvey has firm, well-shaped hands and somehow when I touched them, I suddenly felt a queer little thrill shoot through me. But I thought, then, that it was caused by the prospect of the fun that would ensue when the two men met.

So when Reeves next called, I 'phoned Harvey and then returning to the parlor I was unusually sweet to my admirer, who probably thought I was weakening, for he got a bit gushy.

The door bell rang after a time and I went to answer it. With a shriek of joy, I pretended to drag Harvey into the parlor without even letting him remove his lieutenant's cap and introduced him with great pride.

"This is my friend, Dr. St. John, Mr. Reeves. He's home on a furlough."

Mr. Reeves said he was pleased, but he wasn't. Did this rid me of the man? It did not!

Reeves set about more determinedly to win out. He tried all sorts of things. But Harvey was interested in the game I was playing and so he came around often to find out how I was succeeding in nipping Reeves' grand passion now fully flowered, and thus they often met.

This went on for some weeks, when St. Valentine's Day approached. Would Reeves send me a valentine on the day of the Saint of Belles and Beaux? Of course he would! Most probably one of those immense things loaded down with doves and cupids and tassels and things, in a cardboard box as big as a packing case!

Before this I had always let the day slip by like any other, for no one ever sent me a valentine to remind me of the day. But this year, Stella Clayton invited me to a Valentine Dance she was giving in one of the down-town hotels. I told her that I would not attend as I had no escort, but she insisted and the day before the affair, she called me up to remind me of it.

While I was talking with her, Harvey came in. I was simply overwhelmed with surprise, for he never stopped at my place of employment before. When he heard me again refuse Stella, he asked if I really didn't care to go. Otherwise he'd escort me and was sure we'd enjoy it for the sake of auld lang syne.

So I agreed to go, my heart beating in a queer, flurried fashion. And somehow after I had accepted, I couldn't quite look Harvey in the eye in the old frank way. And I thought, too, there was a little difference in the way he bade me good by that morning.

When he was gone, my thoughts went to my wardrobe. What should I wear? I had many gowns, but I rejected them all, for no man wants to take a woman to a dance and have her dressed like a suffragette.

I decided that during my noon hour, I would go to a modiste's and get a new gown, a creation, in short, of the flimsy, spirituelle variety, so that Harvey need not be ashamed of me.

My plans, however, were interferred with as usual for my pest came to torment me with an invitation to lunch. I refused it, and when he persisted in following me, I decided to go to the modiste's first, and reaching the place, I told him that I was going to get a new gown—that a modiste's was no place for a man and that he'd better go.

He did—but afterward I learned that he went into the place and inquired what sort of a gown I had purchased. That gave him a clue as to where I was going the following night.

The following day was St. Valentine's, and though I thought of the dance from the moment I awoke, and wondered often how I should impress Harvey with my new clothes, I half forgot that it was the day for the exchange of love-knots.

But about eleven o'clock, as I was banging away on my typewriter, a messenger boy came in and placed before me a big box.

"Some horrible valentine, of course," I groaned as I signed for the package. Then I opened it.

A large, heart-shaped box done in red silk came to my view. Atop the box was an immense bow of red ribbon and in the center of it nestled a cluster of brilliant pansies. The box itself contained about five pounds of the choicest candy.

It was very beautiful, and I didn't need to read the card to tell me that it was from Reeves. I pushed it aside a little petulantly, and shall I confess that I thought what a different reception it would have received had it been from Harvey? For the thought did come to me. I dismissed it in a hurry, however, for why should I want or expect Harvey to send me a valentine? He called, it was true, and in Reeves' presence pretenced to be my lover, but I had dragged him into the affair and he was interested in the game, not in me.

A little feeling of pity, then, for the way I was treating Reeves came to me, and slowly drawing the box toward me, I picked up the card.

But immediately the pity went from my heart for on the back of the card he had written:

"Something is prompting me today,
A few soft words to thee to say,
Oh, may these flowers I send to thee
Make love bloom in thine heart for me."

Mush! From what had he copied it? Most probably from some old-time valentine.

There were a few more words scribbled, and I now noted these: "I'll see you at Miss Clayton's party tonight."

The day passed and I went home and dressed for the dance. I think I looked well, and I wondered if Harvey would be pleased. Somehow I felt just a little afraid of him now.

When he came, he brought with him a great sheaf of American beauties. How delighted I was.

"My valentine," he said, bowing low and offering the roses to me.

"Thank you. I received one this morning also," I returned significantly. "I seem to be rather popular for a suffragette."

Harvey smiled knowingly, then said with characteristic brusqueness: "Let's go."

We did, reaching the hotel just when the dance was at its height.

The place was appropriately decorated. Festoons of hearts were looped across the room, the ends of the festoons being fastened to the hands of plaster-of-Paris Cupids. In one corner was an elaborate booth in which love-tokens and valentines could be purchased, and nearby was a large be-ribboned box to hold the valentines sent that evening.

As Harvey and I entered the room, music sounded. He swung me into the bow of his arm and we danced as easily as if it were not the first time since high-school days that we had danced together.

The dance over, we sat down. I was delighted. But it didn't last long for suddenly I heard my pest's suave:

"How d'ye do?"

He sat down beside me, whereupon Harvey, with a peculiar look, said:

"There are quite a few people here I haven't seen in years. Will you excuse me? How long will you take care of Miss Marsh for me, Mr. Reeves?"

"For the rest of the evening, if you wish," he replied.

"Aren't you a bit selfish?" Harvey remarked, and again that peculiar look came into his eyes as he walked away.

"How did you know I was to attend this dance?" I demanded of Mr. Reeves when we were alone.

"I bribed 'Inky' to tell me where you were going. He heard you talking to Miss Clayton and learned the details which he gave me for a consideration. Bright office boy, is Inky. He'll be head of the house some day."

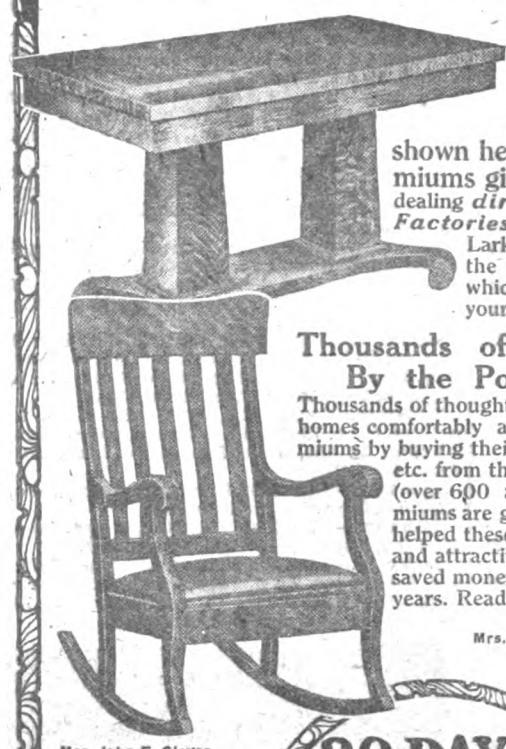
"The little wretch!" I exclaimed.

"I wouldn't call him that," Reeves returned. "With this information," he continued, "I came down, told the people here I hadn't a card of admission but that I was a friend of yours—and it was all right."

So he had used my name as an "open Sesame!"

"I've found out something else, too," he went on. "Dr. St. John has been home from France for over nine months and has been practicing ever since. You're not engaged to him but have been merely using him as a buffer. When I saw him that first time, I thought for a while that what you told me was true, though he didn't act like a lover. Listen, Miss Marsh. You certainly cannot question that I love you——"

"No," I murmured, interrupting, "especially when you sent the valentine you did."



That, however, passed over his head. I had reference to the sentimental verse. He thought I meant the candy.

"Now, if you'll marry me, I'll do my best to make you happy and you can have anything within reason that you wish. If you really loved that chap, I'd quit, but you don't and he surely doesn't love you, for look how he's chattering with those young kids," and Reeves waved toward Harvey, who was amusing a half-dozen girls of the very younger type.

I pondered. Harvey didn't love me. But in that moment, I admitted to myself something I would not admit before. I loved Harvey. Since he didn't care for me, though, and was only

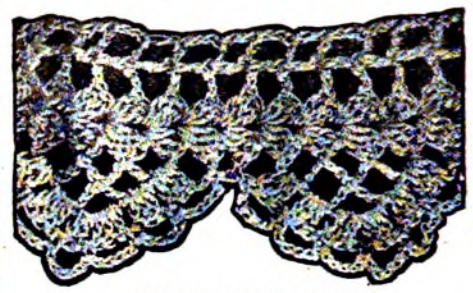
ORIGINAL DESIGN IN FILET CROCHET SQUARE.

Teneriffe Lace Collar

BY ORA ARMSTRONG HILL.

The lace collar illustrated this month can be easily made by any worker who is familiar with drawnwork or teneriffe work, as the sender suggests it would probably be easier to secure a pattern in point lace design, a part of which can be filled in with the narrow braids that come for this work, using lace stitches and the balance with teneriffe wheels as here shown.

TENERIFFE LACE COLLAR.



This unusually attractive piece of work results from combining various motifs of different sizes in a more or less hit-or-miss fashion and simply connecting with a network of lace stitches. The 21 different designs used in this particular piece of work were made on an ordinary bone teneriffe wheel, using No. 60 linen thread.

Negligee Collars

Many of the boys in laying aside their uniforms, find they have completely outgrown their former clothes. Necks especially are larger, and there is a growing liking for the soft collars which always have been so comfortable in warm weather. Like other articles they can be successfully made at home.

To do this buy a pattern correct in style and size or rip and copy exactly a collar which pleases. One and three-quarters yards of linen will make one dozen collars.

Interline them with heavy white muslin, taking care that the lining and outside are both cut the same way, so the collar will not stretch in different ways when laundered, also use all materials only after well shrinking.

Double Fan Lace

This pattern is desirable for towels, pillow cases, scarf ends or aprons.

Begin with ch 54 sts, turn.

1st row.—1 d c in 5th st from hook, 2 more d c in same st, 3 d c in each next 3 sts, this makes a group of 12 d c together, ch 4, 1 sh of 3 d c, ch 1, 3 d c in next 5th st, ch 8, sk 7 sts, 12 d c in next sts, ch 4, sk 4, 1 sh of 3 d c, ch 1, 3 d c in next st, ch 4, sk 4, 1 sh, ch 2, 1 d c, ch 5, turn.

playing his part in my game with Reeves, why not end the comedy at once? Perhaps if I gave serious thought to Reeves—but to think that way made me shudder.

"I can't do it, Mr. Reeves," I said wearily. "I thank you but the prospect of my work at the commission house is far more attractive than being your wife," and catching myself half-way in my sentence, as too truly expressing my honest feeling in the matter, I tried to laugh it off.

"That so?" he queried. "Thanks. I didn't think you'd insult me."

"I'm truly sorry," I replied, for I really was, "but you simply would never believe I meant 'no' when I said 'no' and I had to resort to subterfuge."

Just then Harvey joined us, and the orchestra started to play.

"Shall we dance?" Harvey asked. I simply bowed, for I couldn't look him in the face now, and having admitted to myself that I loved him, the fascination of his uniform set me completely at his mercy.

As we whirled away, I said:

"You need not pay any further attention to me, Harvey. Mr. Reeves has discovered my trick. So enjoy yourself with anyone you please. I appreciate your having helped me in my hoax, but it didn't work. I guess I'm doomed to accept him."

"Why?" Harved demanded.

"Why? Simply because he's so 'gone on me' and I am at the end of my resources for discouraging him."

"I know one plan you haven't tried yet," he said, and he gently danced me into an anteroom, where we stopped. There was something tender and thrilling in his voice that seemed to respond to something within me.

But I tried to be merry though my heart was heavy.

"What? Suicide?"

"Oh, not quite as bad as that," he said. "But you might marry me to escape him."

"Marry you! Oh, Harvey! Why, I've always thought of you—well, to be trite, as a brother."

"Always?" he queried, very low.

"Well—well—" I began, but I simply couldn't go on.

Harvey helped me out.

"Have you discovered what I have? Have you found out that while we played at being lovers, fiction became fact, and that you love me even as I now love you? Could you be something nearer and dearer to me, Lorraine? May I offer myself as a valentine since today is the day of the saint of belles and beaux?"

"You're——you're rather an unexpected one, Harvey," I said, hardly knowing whether I should cry or not for I felt so queer and quivery, and happy.

"But none the less welcome, I hope," Harvey said.

I looked at him, and I'm afraid that I told him then that he had won.

"If I hadn't inveigled you into my game with Mr. Reeves, Harvey——" I began.

"I shudder to think what I would have missed," he interrupted.

Just then Reeves appeared in the doorway.

"They're cleaning up the valentine booth and love-tokens are going at any figure. I suppose, Dr. St. John, you'd object strenuously if I were to send your affianced a valentine?" and he tapped the bunch in his hand.

"I most certainly should," Harvey replied. "But save yourself the trouble, for we shall not wait until the valentine box is opened. Get your wraps, Lorraine, and I'll meet you in the corridor. But before you go——" he took me in his arms and kissed me with his first lover's kiss.

Then I walked away leaving Reeves speechless for a moment.

"Ye gods!" he exclaimed at length (so Harvey told me), "were you two sincere all the while?"

"Of course," Harvey answered loftily.

"Well, if such is the case, I must appear in the light of a comic valentine. I hoped to claim Miss Marsh tonight, and even a while back when she sat on me right, I hadn't given up hope. But now when you yourself confirm it——Oh, good night!" he finished disgustedly, and marched off.

Harvey and I slipped away. A short time after, we were married, and you may judge for yourself as to which one of us did the proposing, Harvey with his formal proposal, or I by accepting his offer to pose as the man to whom I was engaged.

Mr. Reeves wasn't such a bad sort, after all, for he remembered us with a handsome wedding present, and now and then he calls. He had gotten over his penchant for me, and is now so agreeable and friendly that Harvey and I, when we speak of him, in private and meaning no unkindness, call him our comic valentine.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

dress and I will be very pleased to correspond with you.

Now, then, I must say a word to the sister signing herself, "Mrs. C. A. M." She reiterates that old saying: "That after all, men are only babies." Since the first day I was able to pick up a woman's paper I have read those same words or to that effect. I am willing to admit that, it is all too sadly true. But, oh! wouldn't it be a "Grand and Glorious Feeling" to be able to feel that once in a while that it was not so? That there actually were a few men tucked around in corners somewhere who said, along with Saint Paul: "When I was a child I thought as a child, spoke as a child," etc.—"but now I am a man and I will put away childish ways."

And to "A Lover of COMFORT," I want to say: That there can be such a thing as being too literally truthful. Do not, dear young mother, take all the beautiful mystery and romance out of the lives of your little ones. The sordid realities of life will come to them soon enough. The belief in Santa Claus and the beautiful practice of hunting the rabbit's nest for colored eggs at Easter time will do your children no harm. Have you forgotten that our own dear Lord taught his children to love the beautiful by telling them fables and teaching them with parables?

To the sister who is unable to procure the white iodine, although I am not much of a chemist, I think if she puts a little ammonia in the brown, it will bleach it. The druggist can make it for her by using ammonia to dissolve the crystal instead of using the alcohol as is usually done. Some time back I saw a request for the poem, "The Convict Ship," and as there does not seem to have been any response, I am sending it, hoping it may be used when there is space.

C. A. M. OF NEBRASKA.

WILKESVILLE, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

The first thing I saw when I opened my July COMFORT was the little Red Cross twins and then the Yankee Doodle boy and I thought I would send you one of my little girl and her baby cousin. Her name is Helen Claire Foley and his is Thomas William Duffey. She is about two years and three months old when this was taken and he was six months old. We have now another little girl and call her Leila Frances.

I like the Sisters' Corner better all the time and am especially interested in the letters concerning children as mine are willful and hard to manage. Sisters, how do you manage a child that fights back when punished?

Save the best parts of used embroidery and lace to make over into children's clothes. When the yoke on baby's dress wears out you can replace it with a piece of embroidery and no one can tell the difference.

I will close by sending a little verse:

"If any little word of mine can make a heart the lighter,
If any little song of mine can make a life the brighter,
God help me speak that little word, and do my bit of singing
And drop them down in some lonely vale and set the echoes ringing."

MRS. IZEL FOLEY.

STRASBURG, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have taken COMFORT for several years. It was always good but I think it is getting better every year.

I notice among the letters from the different sisters that the family finances seem to be one of the biggest problems of the day so I venture to submit our plan to the sisters, hoping it may be the means of helping someone else along. On pay day my husband gives me his entire pay and is only too glad to get it off his mind as he knows it will be used as well as it can be in these days of high cost of living. We each have our allotted amount of spending money, according to the size of the pay, and after this is taken out I pay all debts and expenses, keeping an itemized account of each and every article, the amount paid for it and date of purchase or payment. In this way we

The "More Eggs" Tonic did wonders for me. I had 29 hens when I got the tonic and was getting five or six eggs a day. April first I had over 1200 eggs. I never saw the equal. EDW. MEKER, Pontiac, Mich.

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

I have fed 2 boxes of "More Eggs" to my hens and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 white leghorns and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs. MRS. H. M. PATTON, Waverly, Mo.

$200 Worth of Eggs from 44 Hens

I never used "More Eggs" Tonic until last December; then just used one $1.00 package and have sold over $200.00 worth of eggs from 44 hens. "More Eggs" Tonic did it. A. G. THODE, Sterling, Kans., R. No. 2, Box 47.

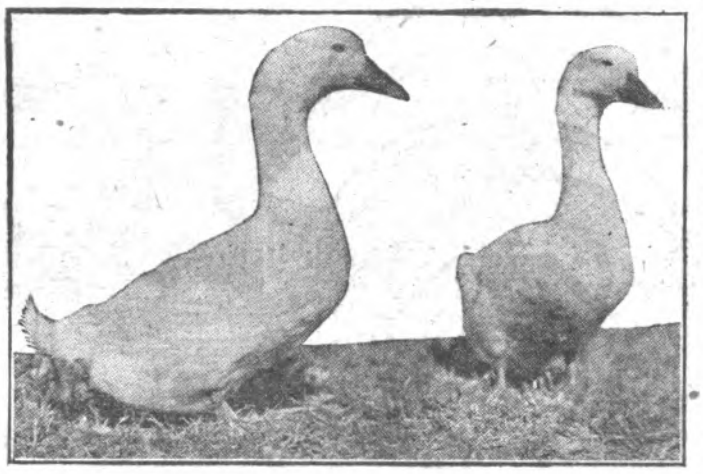
Guinea Fowl



DUCKS and guinea fowl are very profitable stock on a farm, or where they can have plenty of range, for guinea fowl will find the larger part of their own feed. Even when the eggs are hatched under hens, the hen can be released at the end of four weeks, and the youngsters will come up at night with full crops; and until marketed in the fall they need have nothing but a little cracked corn at night, just to bring them home regularly and keep them tame.

The guinea fowl need no special house, all that is necessary for their comfort being a roost high up in a shed. If left to themselves they take to the trees, and in all probability will get frozen if the winter should be severe, so the safest plan with new birds is to cover the front of the shed with two-inch wire netting, just tacking it up lightly, so that it can be easily removed at the end of two or three weeks, when they are accustomed to their new quarters.

While they are prisoners, feed two or three times a day; about half a pint of mixed wheat and cracked corn night and morning, and at noon about half the quantity of grain, with a little chopped meat or ground bone alternating with vegetables. All this food should be cut quite small, or the guineas will not eat it. Like other birds, they must have a constant supply of sharp grit and fresh water.

As a market commodity, they have been growing in favor for the last five years, since, like squabs, they take the place of game during the closed season.

Guinea fowls commence laying when the first warm days come in April. As it is their natural instinct to be very secretive about laying, some patience and diplomacy are necessary to locate their nests. The usual spot selected is a hollow in the ground, by the root of a tree or a fence-post well screened by brush. Don't attempt to approach it while they are in sight. Go away, and return later armed with a long-handled spoon. The eggs are almost the color of the earth and often covered with fallen leaves, so it needs a sharp eye to detect them. Be very careful not to touch the nest with your hand. Guineas seem able to scent the human hand about the nest; they can also count up to three. For that reason, leave that number of eggs in the nest, removing the others with the spoon to insure there being no telltale clue left to arouse Mrs. Guinea's suspicion.

PEKIN DUCKS.

When you have stolen fifteen eggs, get a box a foot square, turn it on the side, and across the bottom of the open front nail a slat, behind which place a nest of soft hay. Stand this nest box inside (at one end) of another box, two and a half feet long, with sides a foot or more deep. Make a cover of wire netting for the large box, to open like a lid. Scatter sand on the floor, nail up a small drinking pan in one corner, and you have a safe, rat-proof coop for Biddy and the eggs. Another motive for the outer box is that baby guineas are so very little, so wild, and so easily frightened, that they are apt to quit the nest as soon as hatched, get lost, become chilled, and die.

It takes from twenty-five to twenty-six days to incubate guinea eggs. The brood coop to be used the first two weeks should be on the same principle as the nest boxes, and even when they are on the grass run, you must exercise the greatest caution to avoid anything like cracks or crevices in or around the side, for they are such mites, and have such capacity for crawling through the eyes of needles, that special care is necessary. If some knothole or some depression in the ground has escaped your notice, and a baby does go off, go about two yards away and remain perfectly still. Don't be impatient. It may be ten minutes before you hear anything. Then, unless all hope is over, you will hear a plaintive little cry. Do not move until it has been repeated three or four times, and you are quite sure where it comes from. Then make a sudden dive and secure the truant, which is usually under a tuft of grass or in some little hole. If you move about while hunting for him, there won't be a sound, and you may search all day with little success.

Bill of Fare for Baby Guineas

Give nothing for the first twenty-four hours, then the daily bill of fare should be as follows: First feed, 7 A. M.—Crushed hempseed, half a cup; stale bread-crumbs, half a cup; moisten with raw eggs.

Second feed, 9 A. M.—Millet seed.

Third feed, 11.30 A. M.—Chopped onion tops, half a cup of cornmeal that has been steamed as for chicks, half a teaspoonful of crushed mustard seed, mixed and fed crumblingly.

Fourth feed, 2 P. M.—Pinhead oats, crushed a little finer than when it is bought.

Fifth feed, 5 P. M.—Liver that has been half boiled, cracked wheat and corn, equal parts.

These bills of fare can be varied with pot cheese, custard, chopped lettuce or apple, bread-crumbs moistened with milk, hard-boiled eggs; but every day they must have meat (more than chicks need) and pepper or mustard seed crushed and fed in soft wood. Keep a small pan of powdered charcoal and sand in the sun, and, of course, water in a drinking fountain that will only allow the beak to get wet.

Ducks

The most important factor in making a success of duck raising is to provide them with dry, comfortable quarters, but a splendid house for twenty ducks can be made on any farm for a dollar, or even less. One man who keeps large flocks makes duck houses with hurdles of green boughs for walls and roof, the outside padded with leaves, straw, corn-stalks or cedar boughs. Each house is six feet by four feet, and two and one half feet high, and accommodates seven ducks and a drake.

Dry goods boxes, costing twenty-five cents at any village store, can be made comfortable for a small flock. The main point is to keep them dry, which depends almost more on the care given to the covering of the floor than to the wall of the house. Good dry bedding, changed at least twice a week, will keep them warm and happy through the coldest weather.

Ducks' eggs bring good prices during February and March. You can easily get them to laying by then, as it depends principally on feeding. Ducks, like geese or cattle, must have a good percentage of bulk material and green stuff, as well as concentrated grain feed. Clover hay, or even mixed hay, chopped and steamed, about half a pailful with a pint of coarsely ground corn meal and the same of bran mixed through it, is about right. If hay is short, chop corn-stalks small, and steam. Chopped vegetables of all kinds are good, but pumpkins, potatoes and beets are fattening; so, unless the weather is very cold, omit the corn when they are fed, using more bran or screenings in its place.

Ducks are such bad mothers that it is better to hatch their eggs under hens or in incubators. The first few eggs a duck lays in each season are seldom fertile. Eleven are a full setting, and it requires twenty-eight days for their hatching. Examine the nest for two or three days after setting the hen, for bad eggs. A weak germ that dies causes the egg to decompose, and the odor once smelled can never be forgotten.

Examine the nest when the hen comes off to feed, and take away the eggs that are dark and mottled. If you fancy an egg looks wrong, pick it up and smell it; that and its sticky touch should assure you, for the egg is porous. If you have been using an incubator to hatch chicks, you can test with a proper tester, and this must be done all the time from the fourth to the fifteenth day.

When the hatch is over at the end of the twenty-eighth day, have ready a box about a foot deep and three feet long, the top cut out and one end taken off. Place the open end against the coop door, so making a little run, with a board floor covered with an inch of sand or dry earth. Baby ducks need even more protection from damp than chicks; therefore, if the weather is bad, keep the coop and run under cover, and, if fine the shade of a tree is necessary, for the little fellows can't stand the full sun. After a week the hen can be removed, but keep them within bounds, on short grass, not letting them out until the dew is gone.

For twenty-four hours feed nothing. First week: Half a pint of rolled oats, some cracker or stale bread-crumbs, two hard-boiled eggs, chopped fine, half a cupful of coarse sand just moistened with milk. Feed four times a day just what they will eat in ten minutes.

Second and third weeks: Half a pound of ground oats, the same of wheat bran, one fourth of a pint of cornmeal, the same of coarse sand, two tablespoonfuls of beef meal, a pint of finely cut green clover, rye or cabbage moistened with scalded milk. They must be fed four times a day.

Fourth to sixth week: Boil a quart of hulled oats for an hour, add a pint of cornmeal, wheat bran, half a pint of grit, the same of beef scraps, and a quart of green clover or any kind of green food. Feed four times a day.

Sixth to tenth week: One quart of cornmeal, a pint of wheat bran, a pint of boiled oats, a pint of beef scraps, half a pint of grit, a tablespoonful of charcoal and a pint of clover. Feed three times a day.

They should be ready to kill the eleventh week.

Do not let the ducks, young or old, get frightened if you can possibly help it. They are nervous things. No matter what you feed, if they are frightened or made to run daily, they will not fatten. If you go about them gently, they are the easiest things to drive any distance, for where one goes, the rest follow; hurry them and they will scatter, and it is good by to them for hours.

The feed for those to be kept for stock is the same up to three weeks old, but from that on one quart of ground feed, one quart of bran, half a pint of grit and half a pint of beef scraps. Mix moist with milk, water, sour milk or buttermilk, and feed night and morning. If on free range, this is all they want. If not, you must add clover or vegetables, and feed three times a day. Remember always to have fresh, clean water before them.

When ducks are ten or eleven weeks old they should be in condition for market. Early green ducks should not weigh more than four and one half pounds, while later ducks cannot be too heavy. As a rule, early ducks mature very

It is rarity which adds value to anything sought by collectors. China, for instance, is a very old country and has produced, without doubt, thousands of vases like those brought from Tealand by your ancestors. P. V., Judson, N. D.—In the manufacture of skis, the curved tips of the skis are planed to be much thinner than the portion of the wood upon which the foot rests in use. This would also refer to the rear ends of the skis. After having reduced the thickness of your piece of pine to about three eighths of an inch at the portion you wish to bend, you can shape the wood by steaming and, when sufficiently pliable, place weights upon it so that it may dry in the desired form. It is a necessary and difficult part of the making of home-made skis to see that there is no twist in the finished product and that the bottom of the ski has a straight, even bearing over the entire surface.

Famous Old Recipe for Cough Syrup

Easily and cheaply made at home, but it beats them all for quick results.

Thousands of housewives have found that they can save two-thirds of the money usually spent for cough preparations, by using this well-known old recipe for making cough syrup at home. It is simple and cheap to make, but it really has no equal for prompt results. It takes right hold of a cough and gives immediate relief, usually stopping an ordinary cough in 24 hours or less.

Get 2½ ounces of Pinex from any druggist, pour it into a pint bottle, and add plain granulated sugar syrup to make a full pint. If you prefer, use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup. Either way, it tastes good, keeps perfectly, and lasts a family a long time.

It's truly astonishing how quickly it acts, penetrating through every air passage of the throat and lungs—loosens and raises the phlegm, soothes and heals the membranes, and gradually but surely the annoying throat tickle and dreaded cough disappear entirely. Nothing better for bronchitis, spasmodic croup, hoarseness, or bronchial asthma.

Pinex is a special and highly concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, known the world over for its healing effect on the membranes.

Avoid disappointment by asking your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with full directions and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Feeding Young Pigs

WE have previously drawn attention to the fact that over-feeding of the sow soon after farrowing is oftentimes a fatal mistake as regards the young pigs and the use of unsuitable food or food that is sour or tainted in any way may have similarly injurious effects upon the litter. A herdsman of the Minnesota Experiment Farm, who has had plenty of experience with such matters, says that sudden changes of food should be avoided and that sour or acid food should not be given until the pigs have been weaned several weeks. We question if such sour or acid food should be used, for it is sure to derange the digestive organs and so retard growth.

At the farm referred to, the brood sows have been fed on shorts, corn and ground oats, in proportion of one half shorts, one half corn and one quarter oats by weight, and a small allowance of oil cake if not on pasture or getting green feed. The young pigs are allowed to run out in the sunshine as soon as strong enough and after they are a week or ten days old they run on pasture with their dam; of course, not very far away from the pen or for any great length of time at first. The idea is that young pigs require exercise just as do all young animals. As soon as the youngsters begin to eat or drink, usually in about four weeks, a little warm skim milk with a handful of shorts stirred in is given them in a trough for themselves, but where the sow cannot reach. The same authority is, like us, of the opinion that a grass or clover pasture is excellent for the brood sow in connection with her grain ration, and if there is no grass or clover, she should have a generous supply of peas and oats grown together, while rape, green corn and sorghum may be cut and taken to her. These green crops are also grand food to help out the pasture when it begins to get short and dry and should be provided on every farm where hogs are kept.

While there is a great difference of opinion as to the length of time pigs should be allowed to remain with their dam, if they only desire to raise one litter from a sow the same year at the Minnesota Station, the pigs are allowed to remain with their dam until they are about ten weeks old, but if two litters are to be raised they are weaned when six to eight weeks old. If the milk of the dam does not agree with the pigs, they should be weaned early, but if they are doing well it is better to let them remain with their dam some eight or ten weeks. If the young pigs are eating well before they are taken from the sow and there is skim milk to give them, they should go right on without any apparent stop in their growth. But if weaned too young and there is no milk to give them, they will not do so well. Last year at the station they had a few pigs that gained a pound a day when they were about nine weeks old, and while still sucking their dams. Usually they have found that they do not gain a pound until they are about ninety days old. After that age they often make a daily gain of more than one pound. After the young pigs are taken from their dam it is a good plan to feed them four or five times daily for a few weeks and later three times. When the pigs are weaned, the dam should be kept away from them and put on scant allowance of food for some time and then if she is thin in flesh or if it is the desire to breed her soon, she will require to be liberally fed.

At the station mentioned they feed sulphur and salt and give the hogs access to charcoal in the pens or yards, and find that while the best of care is absolutely necessary for the best results, even after all is done the results are not always all that could be desired. From what has been said it will be seen that they do not feed much corn, but believe, as we do, that an early ration of nitrogenous foods is best calculated to produce sound, healthy, profitable swine.

Pedigree Seeds Profitable

What are pedigree seeds? This is a very natural question. Pedigree seed are the same as pure-bred seed and pure-bred seeds are those that by careful handling have been kept pure and unmixed with other seeds through a period of years. Pure seed is the aim of every seedsman and the desire of every up-to-date farmer.

Pure Seed Is Hard to Get

Strange as it may seem, absolutely pure seed is hard to obtain. The chief reason is that it is so very easy for seeds to get mixed, in the field, at threshing time, in the bin and in many other ways.

This fact makes the production of pure seeds a real business.

Care Necessary to Produce Pure Seed

The seedsman takes the greatest of care to keep his seeds pure. Long experience has taught him how easy it is for seeds to get mixed. He therefore places his seed plots at safe distances apart, keeps alleys between the plots, carefully cleaned out, has all plots carefully labeled and a record made of each—and uses the utmost care to avoid all possible mixture after the seed is ripe and ready for harvest.

Many farmers engaged in the production of seed grains are equally careful to avoid such mixture.

Pure Seed Should Always Be Used

For the farmer or gardener to use any other than pure seed is a mistake. Mixed seed or "scrub seed" does not germinate alike, grow alike, or mature all at the same time. Either some is over-ripe at harvest, or else a portion is partly green. This condition does not give a good quality or yield and cannot command the best price. We often forget that the seed is half the crop, and are satisfied with any-old-thing just because it is cheap. Remember this—pure seed is never cheap seed. It is always the highest in price—it must be, because it costs more labor and care to produce it. Cheap seed is sure either to be damaged seed or else scrub stuff.

Damaged seed should never be used, and scrub stuff is little better. The rule then is: Always Avoid Cheap Seed.

Seed Frauds

The value of pure seed is so well recognized that it sometimes happens that unscrupulous persons buy up cheap seed or common stuff, give it a high-sounding name and sell it for big prices to the unsuspecting purchaser. Reliable seedsmen never do this, but seed peddlers running over the country, claiming to represent never-heard-of concerns, are the chief offenders.

There is little excuse for getting caught on this hook. Good seed properly advertised, sells itself. There is no use for the seed peddler. He is a pretty expensive proposition. He expects a high salary, and it costs money to pay automobile hire and other travel expenses for him. This, of course, is added to the price of the seed and the farmer pays the bill. Any-old-thing sold in this manner will cost as much as the best pure-bred seed bought direct from the reliable seed house that gets its business before the public by proper advertising.

Nasal Catarrh of Sheep

Under this head may be classed three distinct diseases which are, with one exception, comparatively common in our flocks. They are: (1) Acute nasal catarrh; (2) Chronic nasal catarrh; (3) and Malignant catarrh. The first disease is simple in its origin and treatment, and rarely proves fatal. It is brought on by cold wet weather in spring or fall or by inhalation of dust when driving on the roads, or pollen and dust from too ripe hay. The symptoms of this catarrh or cold in the head are, discharge from the nose, sneezing and wheezing in breathing. The second trouble is termed by most writers on sheep, "benign catarrhal fever," meaning that there is nothing malignant or contagious about it and that it usually runs a mild course. It follows acute catarrh when the causes which have produced the latter are permanent, such as damp weather, cold winds, etc. It is quite common in some flocks, and, according to a noted authority, young and weak animals may in the course of time succumb to the ravages of the trouble. Personally, we have found that the disease itself renders young animals weak, no matter how strong they might be originally, and the weakening renders them liable to death from other troubles, such as intestinal parasites, which otherwise might not lead to that result. The symptoms of chronic catarrh are a persistent discharge of matter from the nose which adheres tenaciously to the inner surface of the nostrils, often gluing them up and forming crusts. The third disease, termed malignant catarrhal fever, is without question infectious, but not common or perhaps present among sheep in this country. The agent of this disease is an infectious principle, which may be perpetuated for years in the same stable, and which may be transported to some distance. The trouble has been seen to break out in animals of sheepfolds which were entirely separated from those in which it existed. It is generally observed in an enzotic or epizootic and is much feared by sheep breeders.

The symptoms of the disease, set down in simple language, are as follows: In the beginning, there is a thick pus-like discharge from the nostrils; the wings of the nose are often glued together; the neighborhood of the nostrils is coated with thick mucous; a mucous discharge often runs from the nose when pressed; in other cases the discharge is offensive; the membrane of the nostril is red and swollen. To these symptoms are sometimes to be added cough, sore throat, bronchitis, and, in serious cases, bronchopneumonia or traumatic pneumonia. In the eyes will be noticed inflammation, ulcers and even abscesses of the cornea. The eyelids are red, swollen and glued by purulent, sticky matter; the hairs upon the inner angle of the eye are

How You Can Earn Good Wages at Home

THIS is Your Opportunity to secure full or part time employment in your own home. We need thousands of new workers, men and women, old and young, to make socks for us at home on the wonderful Auto Knitter, the machine that is better than a hundred hands, for it knits socks in minutes instead of hours.

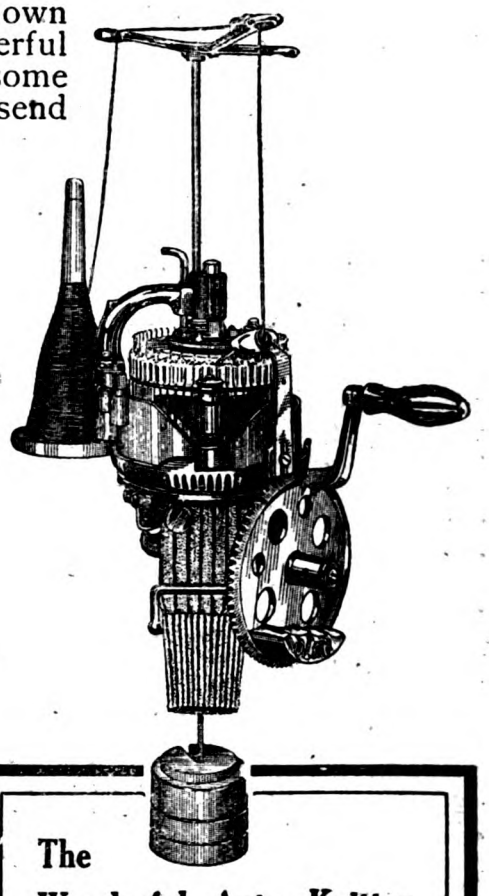
This is not a "canvassing" or "open-a-store" scheme. It is a straightforward employment proposition on a liberal piece-work basis, just as you would make with us if you were to secure employment in our factory knitting socks for us on the Auto Knitter. We give you a printed contract to pay you a fixed wage no all the socks you supply us with, whether the amount be large or small.

We Supply Yarn Free—And Buy the Socks

THERE is a tremendous shortage of hosiery all over the world. In every Country, City, Town and Village there is a crying demand for more socks. This demand is your personal opportunity to add substantially to your income every week—to help you meet the constantly increasing cost of living.

You make this money pleasantly and easily in your own time, and in your own home, using the swift and wonderful Auto Knitter to do the work. As soon as you have some socks ready, you send them to us and we immediately send you your pay check and a shipment of yarn Free to replace the yarn in the socks you supplied to us.

We Need More Workers



THE demands made upon us for hosiery are enormous—more than we can supply. For this reason we need all the additional workers we can possibly get to supply us with socks made on the Auto Knitter—need them badly. We need all that you and your family can make. We want you to devote just as much time as you can spare to the work—and when you have the Auto Knitter ready at your hand—ready to Knit Hours into Dollars—you'll be surprised yourself to find how much time you can give to the work. You know beforehand just what your pay will be—our written contract guarantees you a fixed wage for every dozen pairs of socks you supply us with, and, remember, we supply, Free, the yarn needed to replace that which is used in making the socks you send us.

The yarn we supply is the well-known Qu-No Quality Brand, made especially for the Auto Knitter. It is the Softest, the Warmest, the Strongest—uniform in quality, weight and shade, and always obtainable. Our Free Shade Card contains samples of Qu-No Quality Brand Yarn.

Our Wage Contract binds us to pay you for all the socks you supply us with—but it does not bind you in any way. You are at liberty to dispose of your output as you see fit; you can also use the Auto Knitter to supply all the hosiery your family needs—wool or cotton, as you prefer—at a remarkably low cost.

No Experience Necessary

NO knitting or mechanical experience is required to operate the Auto Knitter. Its operation is purely mechanical, just as is the operation of the sewing machine. You turn the handle and the Auto Knitter knits swiftly and evenly. Many of our best paid operators are men and women of advanced age who knew absolutely nothing of the operation of the Auto Knitter other than the instructions contained in our Free Instruction Book. Through the use of the Auto Knitter they are making good and steady wages in the comfort of their own home. You, too, should be enrolled in our army of happy home workers with a permanent wage contract in your pocket and a guaranteed customer for all the socks you can supply.

The Wonderful Auto Knitter

IT MAKES the entire sock or stocking—top, body, heel and toe—without removal from the machine. Just one turn of the handle knits 60 and more perfect, even stitches. Thousands of such stitches can be made in a few minutes by an operator of average experience. Many of our workers report that with the Auto Knitter a complete sock can be made in less than ten minutes. The Auto Knitter weighs about 20 pounds and can be clamped to any ordinary table or stand. Experience in knitting or familiarity with machines is absolutely unnecessary. Complete instructions about how to work the Auto Knitter are sent to every worker and you can easily and quickly learn to operate the machine swiftly and profitably. Many of our workers report earning as high as $4.00 a day with the Auto Knitter.

Read the following letters from a few of our workers:

Makes $35 in One Week

The Auto Knitter is one of the best investments anyone could make. I can make three pairs of socks in an hour. In one week I made $35.00 from private trade alone. It is the finest and cleanest work I have ever done, and I would not be without it.

Thrift Stamps from Garters

Men's garters cost anywhere from twenty-five to fifty cents, but they can be made easily at home with a trifling outlay. Buy one and a third yards of elastic, which is enough for two pairs, cut it the desired length and fit it on the fasteners and pads made of the worn-out supporters. By following the pattern of the old pair, a new one can be made within a few minutes. Incidentally, the money thus saved will buy a Thrift Stamp from Uncle Sam.

What 15 Cents Will Bring You From the Nation's Capital

The little matter of 15 cts. in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 27th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, briefly—here it is. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in new friends.

Washington has become the World's Capital and reading the Pathfinder is like sitting in the inner council with those who mold the world's destiny.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

M. D., Fisher, Ill.—As the sister of this boy you so dislike is one of your good friends, we should think that you might get her to make her brother understand how distasteful to you were his company and continual attentions—which attentions, when they extend to the offering to purchase for you a new winter coat, are ridiculous and incorrect. You state that this boy is your brother's friend, also. In that case, you should ask your brother to explain frankly and clearly to your obnoxious suitor that you do not want him "hanging around."

M. S., Eden Valley, Minn.—It should be easy for you to drop some hint to your Sunday caller that you would like him better if he wore his best clothes on the best day of the week. (2) You may read any book of which your mother approves.

CURLY, Nekoma, N. D.—You say that this young man, when he "takes" you anywhere, always "kisses and fondles" you. If you read this column, you should know that these are privileges you may properly grant only to your fiance. Certainly you cannot consider yourself engaged to this over-affectionate suitor, for you state that "he goes out with other girls'"—and your common sense should tell you, if your self-respect does not, that he doubtless distributes his kisses among these girls, also. Suppose you try restricting his liberties, and if you cannot make him behave properly, you should tell him that you have decided to leave him to the "other girls." For love is a monopoly which must be established on the basis of "protection" and not of "free trade."

BROWN EYES, Liberty, S. C.—Yes, you may allow your fiance to kiss you. This is a privilege he would rightly expect to have granted him. (2) We cannot answer your second question because you do not mention whether you are to have a church wedding, or if the ceremony is to be performed at the home of your parents. You have our best wishes for your future happiness.

MRS. J. E. A., Ottumwa, Ia.—If your question refers to the setting of a table, we answer that the knife is placed on the right-hand side of the plate and the fork and any spoons are placed on the left. (2) Yes, a young married woman may enter a cigar store to purchase magazines if she knows that she will receive proper and courteous treatment.

ROSY CHEEKS, McAlisterville, Pa.—Ordinarily no reply is needed when a friend thanks you for some simple favor or courtesy. In certain cases you might say: "It was no trouble," or, "I was very glad to do it." (2) It would be best for you to accept no gifts from this boy friend, except simple ones consisting of books, candy or flowers.

DIMPLES, Nekoma, N. D.—There was no reason for the young man you write about to have become offended because you had made a previous engagement to attend the picnic at which he wished to have been your escort. Why should you think you need "ask his pardon"? If he cares no more for you than to drop his attentions on account of this slight and ordinary incident, you may consider yourself well rid of a grouchy and unenterprising young man. It was your duty, of course, to have kept the engagement you had already made to attend this picnic, and you could, under no circumstances, have been expected to have accepted the second invitation and changed your escort. And you must not use the word "guy" in your conversation or letters.

LITTLE ORPHAN, Enloe, Tex.—You may, if you wish, suggest to a boy friend that he should write to you if you know each other well. It would be proper to let him write the first letter. (2) It makes absolutely no difference, when a boy and girl who are acquaintances meet, which speaks first.

L. D., Oklahoma City, Okla.—Tell this young man that, because you and he are but friends, you think it best that you should meet without any exchange of kisses.

VIOLET, Grady, N. C.—No; the use of almond meal on the face, in place of soap, will not cause the growth of "superfluous" or any other kind of hair.

BLUE EYES, Pleasanton, Kan.—A man who was your escort at church would not be expected to make your contribution for you. You should have your own purse.

S. K., Blackford, Ky.—If this young man asked you to marry him over a year ago, you are certainly justified in asking him frankly when he means the ceremony to take place. Tell him that it is not fair to you to allow matters to rest as they are now. And as your mother and father are familiar with the situation, why not have them say a few words to this slow suitor who has been coming "14 miles" for so many months, but never arrives at the altar?

E. M. P., Truce, Kan.—You may go to the moving pictures with your boy cousin, if your parents do not object.

JUST A GIRL, Mich.—You would not be expected to remove your gloves at the funeral. (2) It has become almost the universal custom for a lady to remove her hat at the theater, or any like form of entertainment. At any informal gathering of any sort, you may remove your gloves if doing this adds to your comfort or convenience.

G. K., Duster, Tex.—We most certainly agree with your father's objections. It is wrong and absurd for a girl of fifteen, and in the seventh grade, to fancy she can receive serious attentions from a boy, and to consider any offer of marriage from him. Your sensible parent might well add an active strap to his objections. (2) Of course you should not wear a skirt so tight that you cannot step into a carriage.

M. S. and J. H., Humoke, Ark.—At twenty you should not fear commencing to be classed with "old maids." Of course, it is flattering to a girl to receive plenty of proposals, but only one good one is necessary as a stepping-stone to the marriage ceremony. We fancy the difficulty is that you are too popular. You say: "We keep company with lots of boys and have lots of love affairs." Try to be not quite so diffusive with your companionship and affection, and perhaps some young man will then concentrate in obtaining for himself only the accomplishments you have previously freely extended.

H. D., Mountainberg, Ark.—You ask: "What do you think of him?" And we answer that we have a very poor opinion of any man who profits by an opportunity to pass himself off as a single man when his wife is not on the scene to offer contradictory evidence.

BLUE EYES, Brownstown, Ill.—It was very sensible for you to show this card to your mother and to realize that at fourteen your mind and attention should be given to your school books. (2) Tell this boy you do not like him to put his arm around you. If he does not stop at your request, complain to your grandparents.

B. B., Sisseton, S. D.—The "first thing you should start eating" at the table, is whatever dish or article is served the first. When in doubt, watch others who are with you. (2) The department "Talks With Girls" may be addressed care of COMFORT.

TROUBLES, Nekoma, N. D.—As you do not say you were engaged to this soldier, we cannot consider that he had any right to demand that you received absolutely no other attentions from other young men. This would be a matter resting entirely with you to decide. Tell him this if any conversation occurs between you. Unless you care particularly for your dissatisfied soldier, there is no reason why you should not continue to accept the attentions of your second suitor. But you are young enough yet to have many "troubles" settled—and to profit by the old saying: "It is well to be off with the old love, before you are on with the new."

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

VALENTINE greetings to all the girls, and this morning I feel as much of a girl as any of you, and why shouldn't I? This week, in spite of my years, dignity and before-mentioned adipose tissue, I've been skating, coasting and snowshoeing with a nice young man—twelve years of age. And I'm feeling so good natured that I couldn't be coaxed to scold, not even a teeny weeny scold. While I'm so much in accord with the universe, I'll go to work.

GOLDEN LOCKS, Texas.—There is a chance that the girl in another town is just an innocent fabrication on the part of your sweetheart to make others think he is a regular "divil among the women," but if she is a real person you should know about her. You might call his bluff by refusing to receive attentions from him on the ground that it would be unfair to her. (2) Don't go to the store where he is employed for a chat with him. His employer pays him to wait on customers and not talk to girls. If you don't go there, neither he nor the people can say you are "chasing" him. Some boys get a swelled head so easily.

ELSIE, Mich.—If you aren't thinking to yourself that you are sorry you ever wrote such a silly letter to me, then I am much disappointed in you. And you wrote such a good letter, too. Of course you aren't in love with a fifty-year-old traveling man, now are you? Regular joke, isn't it? Goodness, child, he may have children and grandchildren.

LILLIAN, Pa.—Complete your high school course before training for nursing. In fact, a high school education or its equivalent is required in most hospitals. You are rather small but if you are strong and healthy your size ought not to count against you. It is hard work, though. (2) You are not too old to wear your hair in curls but do it up before presenting yourself to the matron of the hospital.

EVA, S. D.—You should have allowed him an opportunity to explain and apologize. I don't think you have behaved in a very ladylike manner.

MRS. JAMES.—Don't ask me what I think of husbands. If I told you what I thought of some of them you would immediately stop your subscription to COMFORT. There are a number of good ones, though. Your husband should give you money for clothes, but remember he has to pay the rent, grocery bills, all household expenses, etc., and it costs a lot to live nowadays, so you should make your wants as modest as consistent with the climate and public opinion. However, if he is spending money foolishly and not saving any at all, you should demand your share of it, to save or spend as you please.

SMILES, DIMPLES AND CURLS, Kans.—The young man in question evidently believes there is safety in numbers and he should be complimented upon his diplomacy in keeping three girl chums guessing. I don't think he likes any of you "best" but likes all just the same, so instead of being three foolish Pandoras (and I think she was very unwise, don't you?) why not be content to let things go on as they are and all remain good friends?

WYSOX, Pa.—I cannot give you any information about the matrimonial club mentioned, having had no experience in that line. Doubtless you could get as good a husband through this particular club as you could through any mail-order-marriage club. Sometimes such marriages result happily but would advise you to go slow.

ANNIE, Virginia.—I agree with your father, in that you should give this unreasonably jealous person up. Your life would be miserable as his wife and you would be much more unhappy than you are now. Isn't it possible for you to go away on a long visit? A change of scene and people often works wonders and you may find that you are not so deeply in love with him as you think you are. Of course, if you find out that you love him and will be unhappy without him, you'll just have to marry him and be unhappy with him.

SCHOOL GIRL, Tenn.—If you have no objection to marrying a widower with three small children, then I am sure it is all right, but think well before you assume so much responsibility. Can you give the children a mother's love?

SUNSHINE, Texas.—You are the only one who can decide which boy you like better but don't turn No. 1 down because his father wasn't the right sort, if the boy himself is all right. And don't favor No. 2 because his parents are so respectable unless he is, too. Some of the cleanest and best fellows I know have the worst kinds of parents, and some of the worst boys I know have the best parents, so there you are. You can't always tell.

TEXAS TWINS.—You weren't responsible for the breaking down of the automobile so can't be blamed for being out so late but I have an idea you should not not have been out automobiling, unchaperoned, anyway. (2) Half past ten is as late as gentlemen callers should stay, even if your parents don't object if they stay till twelve and you think one-thirty all right. (3) The woman who marries a traveling "sailesman" must make up her mind to being left alone, so think it over before deciding. (4) No, of course it isn't any harm to fool a boy and get him to give you a diamond ring and then break the engagement and refuse to return the ring. No harm at all; it's just a little, mean and dishonest, but don't let a little thing like that disturb you, fair one.

SWEET SIXTEEN, Maryland.—You are about the right weight for your height, I should say, though it wouldn't hurt if you were a few pounds heavier. Keep right on thinking your angel mother was the best woman on earth and don't ever do anything that you think would displease or hurt her. I have no objection to the young man you mention and if you like him you have my blessing—to be held in store until you are older.

LILY, Conn.—It was good of you to let me know that my advice of four years ago helped. Very glad it did. Don't expect your fiance to give up smoking entirely but I do think he might cut the number of cigars down a trifle for your sake.

W. A. B., New York.—Give your husband a dose of his own medicine and if he humiliates you in the presence of others, "just to get your goat," find out what he is particularly sensitive about, and innocently(?) spring it on him at a time and place where it will do the most good. Or you might refuse to accompany him any place until he gave up such a mean habit. Surely you can devise some way of breaking him of this habit.

UNHAPPY WIFE, Indiana.—It seems to me that you are committing a sin when you continue to live with a man such as you describe. You should have left when you had only one child to care for instead of three—but that's better than four or five.

CLARICE, S. Carolina.—God might understand and forgive you for marrying again but the judge won't be so lenient unless you procure a divorce first. Don't be in such a hurry the second time.

BETSY, N. C.—You don't want a husband who has so little faith in you that he will believe false stories about you. Tell him so.

BEA, Maine.—A divorce would be necessary first. Then the second marriage would be legal.

GRACE, Texas.—Don't show so plainly that you are in love with him—if you are now. Let him do a little guessing. I'm rather inclined to agree with your Dad.

Wasn't I angelic? But beware, next month I may be as cross as the proverbial two sticks, but if I am, remember that it is for your own good, and I love you just the same.

Fortunes Founded Through Luck

CHARLES R. FLINT.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IT was a brawl on the docks one day between two peppery Irish teamsters that constituted the piece of luck founding Charles R. Flint's fame and fortune as a financier. Young Flint, then only eighteen, slightly built but athletic, happened along at the psychological moment and nervily stepped between the irate combantants, either one of which, with one hand, could doubtless have flung him into the river. But his rapid, resolute action daunted the rough teamsters, and what he said was even more to the point. Result was the two fighters shamefacedly "made up," one of them saying:

CHARLES R. FLINT.

"Shure, it's yerself cud talk the birds off the trees, and it's the foine lad ye are, afther all!"

Now, a witness of the whole scene was one of the Grace brothers of New York, and it did not take him long to size up the "lad" as being just the one to fill a vacancy. A young fellow of his quickness, courage and resolution, he decided, would show the same qualities in a position higher up. So, following the young man, he made himself known, and this is how Charley Flint became confidential clerk to Grace Bros.

Flint, pleased with his changed prospects, entered upon his new duties with energy and enthusiasm, soon exceeding the firm's greatest expectations. But when he was twenty-one, the boy audaciously organized a firm of his own, Gilchrist, Flint & Co., ship-chandlers! His father, grandfather and great-grandfather, by the way, had all been shipbuilders, so he was only treading in their footsteps and destined soon to earn the title of "Naval Purveyor to South American Republics," for before long he was fitting out South American navies.

His friends laughed at his "folly." The idea of a lad of his age being so ambitious! However, he laughed back, pushed ahead, one enterprise following rapidly on another, and everything prospered with him.

At twenty-two his old friends, Grace Brothers, made him a partnership proposition, and Flint became a partner in both branches of the house, and himself founded a third branch in Peru, at Callao, where, in addition to attending to his business, he still found time to act as Chilean Consul and Charge-d'Affaires, and, later, as Acting Consul-General for Nicaragua and Costa Rica!

When he returned to the United States, brisk, alert, superabundantly energetic, he was almost twenty-three! And his ambition was greater than it had been. He glimpsed wonderful possibilities in South America, and, in fact, everywhere, for American trade and inventiveness, and, born organizer and executive as he was, he formed one corporation after another in rapid succession, soon becoming known as the "Father of Trusts."

For more than thirty years now he has been organizing, consolidating and managing the Rubber, the Chewing-gum, and innumerable other consolidations or so-called trusts. He has shown himself a shrewd financier, public-spirited and patriotic. At the outbreak of the Spanish War, the task fell to him, via President McKinley, to "corner" all available "on sale" warships of the smaller European powers and South American, and, needless to say, Flint & Co., Inc., bagged their game.

Mr. Flint's business affairs now cover the world. He owns his pack of hounds, fast yachts and other concomitants of wealth, and fishes and hunts here and abroad.

But he owes the start of his dizzily rapid climb to great wealth and influence to his lucky saunter on the dock when the two Irishmen pitched into each other, and he intervened. This was his first diplomatic job!

A Head of Gold

Did you ever draw a mule's head? You used a pen or a pencil, a colored crayon, charcoal or a brush. You did not pay twenty dollars an ounce for the material that composed or formed the outline, as that would be sheer waste.

Jacob Heatherington, an Ohio man, did. Over the door of his home he placed in a surface of fresh cement dozens of gold nuggets which accurately picture a mule's head. This picture of Jerry is the most expensive any mule ever had.

In the early days the man and his mule worked in a mine. The man used a pick and Jerry did the hauling. Riches came. Jerry grew old and died. But the millionaire remembered his faithful mule and pictured him in gold so that all comers would know that Jerry had not been forgotten.

That's the simple story of Heatherington, Jerry and the gold head. How many owners of mules and other working animals treat them as they would wish to be treated, if they were the mules and the mules themselves?

They Never Come Back

Exiled kings never return. Anyone who takes the trouble to brush up his history in these days will be surprised to find the verdict of the past. Here is an answer, no doubt, to the question often asked today as to whether the former Kaiser of Germany may return to his throne. Mr. Hohenzollern is the fourth German emperor to be dethroned in several centuries past. Like him, they were rich and powerful, but their influence ended once they left the throne. A list of scores of dethroned monarchs shows that the chances of returning to power is about one in a hundred. Once the tinsel which bedecks royalty has been torn away, its power disappears. —Boys' Life for December.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

LICE.—I have a young draft filly two years old last May, that appears to be infected with lice. I have used lard and coal oil with no good results. Would it improve her for me to get on her back and exercise her? L. D.

A.—Do not ride the filly, but let her occupy a box stall and run out daily for exercise. Clipping would make treatment more effective. In cold weather, liquids cannot well be used to destroy lice, but if you dust the infected parts freely with a mixture of two parts of pyrethrum powder and one part each of powdered tobacco leaves and flowers of sulphur and then blanket the filly, that treatment should help. Repeat it as seems to be necessary. Cleanse, disinfect and whitewash the stable.

SWELLING UNDER JAW.—Please tell me what is the matter with my cow. A swelling started under her jaw about six months ago. It gets larger, instead of going down. It doesn't bother her in eating, and she seems in good condition. I feed her cottonseed hulls, bran and meal. R. O. L.

A.—This may be a case of lump jaw, but tuberculosis also causes swellings about the throat and under the jaw. It would therefore be well to have the cow tested with tuberculin. Meanwhile, clip off the hair and paint the lumps with tincture of iodine every other day.

SORES ON PIG.—I have had a Duroc-Jersey pig, two weeks, that has sores all over body and especially on shoulders and ears. I feed him good slop and a little corn. What is the trouble and remedy? L. M. L.

A.—Such sores usually are caused by wet and filth in the bed, pen or yard. Do away with such causes. Tub the pig in a warm solution of coal tar dip made according to directions given by the manufacturer and adding enough crude oil to coat the surface. Rub it in with a brush and repeat the treatment when it seems to be necessary. Dust sores with sulphur after the bath.

TUMOR.—I have a horse, seven years old, that has a lump on the lower part of his right collar bone. It came about three weeks ago and was soft, like a pus formation. Bathing it every day, it diminished, but left a long formation about three or four inches long that feels like gristle. He had a trouble of this kind last year and it had to be lanced and treated. It left no scar and is perfectly smooth. I drove him about six miles when two shoes were off and he was tender, but the swelling did not appear for thirty-six hours or more. His shoulders have always been very tender and require a great deal of care when worked. MRS. J. E. H.

A.—Bruising from any cause may cause such a condition, but the collar usually is to blame. Pus should have been liberated by lancing. A tumor now has formed and should be dissected out by a competent surgeon, after which treat it as a common wound. If you cannot have this done, clip off the hair and apply tincture of iodine every other day.

BAWLING COW.—I have a milk cow five years old that has always run in a pasture with other cows until two months ago, when I moved to town and moved her also. She bawls about all the time and so loud it disturbs the neighbors, and the longer she stays the more she bawls. She will stop eating and bawl at everything she sees or hears. I give her plenty to eat and she is hearty and gives lots of milk and is a good cow in every way. What can I do to keep her quiet? Is there something I can give her that will destroy her bawling and not hurt her in any other way? I am kind to her and pet her every day. She did not do this way until I moved here. MRS. B. B.

A.—Buy a calf and stable it with the cow for company. She is lonesome. We know of no remedy other than company or "back to the farm" for this cow.

SNEEZING CAT.—I have a cat which I raised from a kitten, and appears to be in good condition but sneezes many times each day. One of its eyes was weak for a time, but is better. Please tell me what to do. L. M. H.

A.—Let the cat live an out-door life, so far as possible and find its own living. So treated, it should become hardy and quit sneezing. The animal, no doubt, is soft from pampering.

OBSTRUCTED TEAT.—I have a cow which has lumps in all the teats, about the size of a pea. What is the matter and what can I do to remedy it? M. B. D.

A.—Warty or fibroid tumors are present in the teats and if they make milking difficult and cannot be removed by operation, the cow should be fitted for the butcher. If possible, have a qualified veterinarian examine the teat to determine if an operation would succeed.

SCOURS.—I have a mare, nine years old, that has bowel trouble. When she is worked she seems healthy, but as soon as she stands idle a few days in the yard or barn her bowels become abnormally loose. O. K.

A.—Stop feeding grain of any sort when the mare is idle. Strange as it may appear, we have found that the feeding of carrots sometimes proves beneficial in such cases. If medicine proves necessary, mix in feed twice daily a tablespoonful of a mixture of two parts of powdered wood charcoal and one part each of subnitrate of bismuth, powdered catechu and alum.

LICE.—I wish to know what to do for my pups. They are covered with little white lice and nits. They look something like chicken lice. MRS. N. R.

A.—Tub the puppies in a warm bath of coal tar dip or disinfectant made according to directions given by the manufacturer, and repeat when seen to be necessary. Provide a new, clean bed in a dry, sanitary place.

AILING PIGS.—I have a bunch of June pigs, weighing about one hundred pounds, and I have fed table scraps, corn meal, corn chops and shorts. They are all lame in hind legs and have their backs humped up. Their ears get stiff and sharp and if you try to move them they squeal as though you were killing them. What is the trouble and what can I do for them? J. N. H.

A.—Confinement and improper feeding cause such conditions in swine. They are rare when pigs are raised on green crops, especially alfalfa, clover and rape, and are also allowed plenty of milk daily. Improvement may follow if you allow the pigs their liberty and feed them well on milk and mixed meals and allow free access to alfalfa hay.

THIN HORSE.—I have a horse nearly four years old. He appears to be healthy and eats good. His hair is rough and bushy, skin is tight. I cannot get him fat. What can I do to make him look better? J. W.

A.—Have the horse's teeth put in order by a veterinarian, then mix a quart of blackstrap molasses with three quarts of hot water and stir it among cut hay, corn meal and wheat bran and feed it night and morning. Allow whole oats at noon and long hay at night. More than a quart of molasses may be fed twice daily, if that proves necessary.

THIN MARE.—I have a mare four years old that is thin and will not fatten. She is well fed and hearty. I have noticed that she grits her teeth quite often. What can I do for her? H. C.

A.—See answer to J. W.

are able to give an account of every cent of the pay envelope, should the occasion ever arise. A very good way indeed should Friend Husband think you did not use prudence and discretion. Some will say they are too busy for this but it really takes only a few minutes each day and once started you will never go back to the old way. We have been married three years and I have all my books showing where and for what purpose our money has been spent and my later books show a decided improvement over the former ones.

Very sincerely, MRS. EARL SPINDLER.

A Cozy Corner Critic

Rap, rap, rap! hello there, sisters dear—
How pleased I am to find you all so snugly gathered here.
And this is Mrs. Wilkinson, the dear old loving soul—
Who helps us all through tears and trials to reach a worthy goal.
And here is Uncle Charlie, too, I'll greet him with a kiss—
That is, if he'll accept it for I'm Mrs. and not Miss.
And there is Bachelor Billy. Why, Bill, how do you do—
Just keep on being grouchy and I'm sure that you'll pull through Without the joys of wedded life, whatever they may be,
For there's often troubled water on the Matrimonial Sea,
And you may grouch just all you please, in your lonely bachelor home
Without a fear of a rolling pin descending on your dome.
And here is George L. Garrison—but say, it puzzles me
How such a kind, good man as that can still claim he is free
From the charm of dangling apron-strings. Why, George, look over there!
Can't you see the smiles the single girls are entrusting to your care?
And heavenly bliss, if there ain't Criss, from the state of the long leaf pine,
Hello sister dear, I'm glad you're here for your views correspond with mine.
And over there's Verne Ellis—and Fred McDonald too,
But I guess if I were to name you all I never would get through.
So I'll tell you how I look for it's quite too dark to see
And I know you're all awondering who on earth that freak can be.
I'm five feet four—in high-heeled shoes—I weigh one hundred and ten.
And I used to be a bad little flirt 'fore my prison days began.
My hair is straight, of a dark brown shade, my eyes are a hazel blue;
My complexion is fair—I've a roundish face—and I'll leave the rest to you,—
Except my age which is twenty-one—I was married three years ago.
I've a baby girl, just two years old. Guess that's all you'll care to know.
In the beautiful hills of Wisconsin is where we make our home,
But my nature is sort of restless—and I often long to roam,
To see the bigger things of life—to cross the wide, wild sea
And get a glimpse of foreign lands, which ever are wondrous to me.
But I fear you are growing weary so I'll shut off my speedy pen
And to each I'll say a "God Bless You 'Till We Meet Again."

TENNESSEE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have enjoyed COMFORT ever since I was a child, for my mother was an old subscriber, and I have taken it ever since I was married. I enjoy the sisters' letters most of all but never had the courage to write until I read "Wife-in-Name-Only's" letter and then I just couldn't keep still, for once I had to face a problem almost exactly like hers, and I thought my experience and the way I solved it might help her.

Dear "Wife in Name Only," when I married, I was an orphan and as the years passed on and I never had any little ones with which to divide my love, I gave the whole of it to my husband, petted and spoiled him until he had no doubt of my whole undivided love—and let me say, girls, that is a sad mistake; you've got to keep a man guessing if you would hold him—but I didn't know any better then and went on loving, petting and slaving for him, until I broke down and had a very serious illness which left me a nervous wreck and almost helpless. It would take too long to go over all the horrible details of those darkest hours of my life; my case was almost exactly like your own; my husband fell in love with the pretty nurse that attended me, and I was so trusting that I couldn't see it until she herself told me that they loved each other, and that he told her that he had never loved any one as he loved her. It was impossible for her to stay after our talk, so she went away before my husband came from work, leaving me the whole day alone with my load of sorrow. But it was better for me to be alone a while to think it over for when he came home I was able to talk it over calmly although my heart was breaking.

We had no children to bind us together but he told me he loved me with a brother's love and wanted

MRS. G. A., Texas.—If your mother's parents died forty years ago, and your mother has neglected to prosecute her claim for an inheritance left her by them for this period of time, I am of the opinion that she has little or no chance of now enforcing any claim she had at that time.

MRS. B. H., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think your father's second wife will, upon his death, have any interest in the real estate left him for life by your mother.

MRS. F. J., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your husband can be compelled to support you while living with him, in a manner commensurate with his means and station in life, but he cannot be held responsible for the acts and conduct of his adult children by a former marriage, unless he compels you to live in the same home with them, and their conduct to you is of such a nature as to amount to cruelty.

M. A., North Carolina.—We think you would be very foolish to sell your property and turn your money over to your husband; if, as you state, he does not treat you right now, we fail to understand how your condition would be improved by turning your property over to him.

M. S., Texas.—We think the man who beats his wife subjects himself to a liability of a fine or imprisonment. We think the wife should make her complaint to the local authorities and have him punished for his conduct to her.

MRS. E. G., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the general guardian of the minor children, who have now become of age, can be compelled to account and turn over the moneys of the estate belonging to these children, in the proper action or proceeding brought for that purpose.

J. K., Nebraska.—We do not think the statute of limitations runs against a deserter from the U. S. army; we think if the desertion took place a long period of years ago, that possibly no effort is now being made to capture and punish the deserter.

MRS. F. E. W., Florida.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your husband's life insurance is made payable to his estate, it will upon his death without a will, and after payment of his debts and expenses, go one third to you and the balance in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

C. F., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your property stands in your name alone, your husband has acquired no interest therein by paying the taxes on same. If he survives you, and you die without a will, he will be entitled to a life estate in your real estate with remainder to your children, and during his lifetime you cannot convey or mortgage same without his joining in the deed or mortgage; if you survive your husband, and he leaves no will, you would be entitled to receive one third of his personal estate, after payment of debts and expenses, the balance going to his child or children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

B. S. C., Texas.—If the land you mention in South Carolina has been abandoned since 1850, we think you now have little or no chance of recovering the same.

MRS. R. D., Oklahoma.—We do not think the loss of your marriage certificate will affect the validity of your marriage. (2) Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your husband dies, without a will, and without a child or descendant, his estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go one half to you and the remaining half to his father or mother, or if he leave both father and mother to them in equal shares; we think if you pre-decease your husband, he would be entitled to continue to hold all of his property, no part of the same going to your heirs-at-law or next of kin, as it will be necessary for you to survive him before you will have any vested or perfected interest in his property.

MRS. A. M., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that in the absence of a will, and after payment of debts and expenses, and subject to the homestead rights of the surviving spouse, estates descend one third to the surviving spouse and the balance in equal shares to the children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share; we think that the estate of a decedent would include any vested interest belonging to such decedent in another estate.

MRS. B. M. C., Colorado.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married woman may convey real estate without her husband's signature to the deed, unless such property has been registered as a homestead; upon her death, without a will, if she leaves also a child or children, her husband would receive one half of her estate, after payment of debts and expenses, the balance going to her children or their descendants; we think life insurance moneys are payable to the beneficiary, and form no part of a decedent's estate, unless made payable to the estate by the terms of the policy.

H. F. C., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property acquired by the husband and wife during marriage, by onerous title, is considered the common or community property, and during the marriage may be disposed of by the husband without the consent of the wife, upon the death of either party, without a will, one half of the community property goes to the survivor and the remainder to the child or children of the deceased in equal shares. We think you should be able to establish your community rights in the property acquired during your various marriages. We think the signatures of your children will be necessary to convey their interest in the property of their dead mother.

M. W., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the signature of the husband is not necessary to the conveyance of the real estate of the wife, unless the property conveyed is homestead property of the wife.

MISS I. C., New Jersey.—Your intestacy rights, in the property deeded to yourself and brother, in case of your brother's death, depend upon the wording of the deed. We think you should have same examined by some competent local attorney.

MRS. L. K., Illinois.—We do not think you can compel your husband to convey an interest in his real estate to you, unless he voluntarily consents to do so; we think you can compel him to support you, unless you desert him, and in case he predeceases you, you will be entitled to an interest in his estate.

MISS E. F., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the personal estate of the woman who died, without a will, after payment of debts and expenses, would go, one third to the surviving husband, and the balance in equal shares to her children, the minor children's share being paid to their general guardian; we think the husband would be entitled to be appointed administrator of his wife's estate, and also to the appointment as general guardian of his children; we think the general guardian can be compelled to account and pay over the infants' share in the property upon their arriving at full age.

MRS. B. T., Mississippi.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man, leaving no will, and leaving no widow, and no child or descendant, his estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to his brothers and sisters and their descendants, by right of representation, and to the father and mother, if living, or to the survivor.

J. W., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, his widow would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, and one half of his personal estate, absolutely, after payment of debts and expenses of administration.

MISS E. L., Wisconsin.—If you are over age, we do not think your stepfather has any right to dictate to you in regard to your property, which came to you through your father's estate. If you are under age, your property rights should be administered by your general guardian, who would have a legal right to compel your stepfather to turn your property over to you; of course, if your mother is your general guardian, and refuses to compel your stepfather to turn over your property, it may be necessary for you to bring a proceeding to have your mother removed from such guardianship, and to have some other guardian appointed who will compel your property rights to be protected.

A. M. G., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that subject to homestead rights, in the absence of a will, the surviving spouse inherits an undivided one third of all other lands of which decedent at any time during coverture was seized or possessed to the disposition whereof, by will or otherwise, such survivor shall not have consented in writing, except lands devested by judicial partition proceeding, execution or judicial sale, by assignment for creditors, or by insolvency or bankruptcy proceedings, and subject to judgment liens, and subject in their just proportion to debts not paid from personal estate, the residue of such lands going in equal shares to the children of the decedent, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share, but if there are no children or descendants, the whole remaining estate, both real and personal, to the surviving spouse.

E. B., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man, leaving no will and leaving no surviving widow, and no surviving child or descendant, his whole estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to his father and mother in equal shares, and if there be but one of the parents living, to the survivor alone.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS M. B., Bethesda, Ohio.—For the rheumatic conditions you describe, massage the limb daily. Douche the spine with cold water before retiring, and take five-grain doses of sodium salicylate, three or four times a day. Of course you must abstain from too much red meat and fruit of all kinds. Keep the bowels open by using a teaspoonful of Rochelle salts, dissolved in hot water, before breakfast. Drink, also, plenty of good spring water—not less than two quarts a day.

MRS. M. R., Alberta, Canada.—Try ovarian extract, in three-grain doses, for the goitre. Take only morning and night, to start with, and watch the result. The moles are best removed by the use of the actual cautery.

MR. R. L. B., Mareville, Ark.—Take tablespoonful doses of Basham's mixture, in water, after meals.

MRS. G. E. A., Lynnville, Ky.—There is no rule about marking a baby. No! no! Keep snakeroot, and all such teas, from the baby. A tea of senna is a pretty good cathartic for grown-up people. Green stools are due to intestinal fermentation, and might be removed by the use of teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia.

MRS. L. M., Trenton, Miss.—Lumps in the breast are always suspicious; not necessarily malignant; but they should be watched, and, if growing, should be removed at once.

MRS. R. B. B., Johnson City, Tenn.—No doubt your son needs a change to the mountains, and an out-of-door life for a few months. This will do for him more good than any medicine will do.

MRS. E. S., Texas.—Do not use carbolic acid to remove warts at all. Go to some good doctor and have them removed by using the actual cautery. This will remove them permanently, and leave no scar. For the headaches, have your eyes examined by a competent oculist, as eye-strain often causes all kinds of headaches.

MRS. W. E. R., Calham, Ga.—Poor circulation causes the "knots in the arm." Massage the arm, keep your bowels free, and take a tablespoonful of Basham's mixture, after meals, in water. Have the boy's adenoids removed at once.

MR. G. R. S., Walkertown, Ind.—A plastic operation, by some good surgeon, is the only thing that will remove the scar, mentioned in your letter. The other remedies referred to are not indicated at all.

MRS. F. H., Vessie, Mo.—You probably need exercise out-of-doors daily, also a plain diet free from sweets and pastry. You also should keep your bowels free by using some good cathartic, such as compound cathartic pills. Drink water freely, and with your meals use a teaspoonful of American Oil.

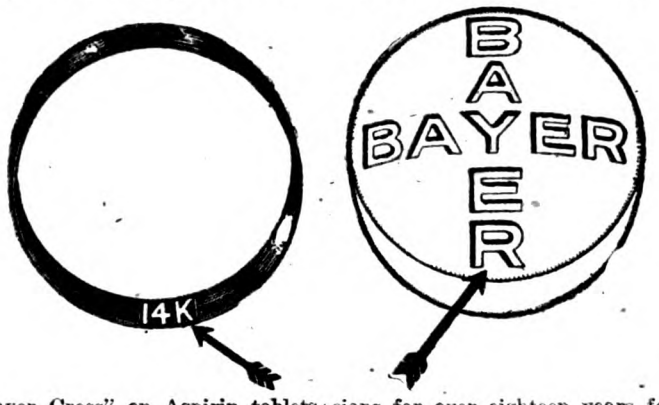
MISS S. F. D., Anderson, S. C.—You cannot buy carbon dioxide snow. And you cannot use it even if you could get it. It must be purchased and used by someone accustomed to its use, only.

MR. W. H. H., Gulfport, Miss.—Your neuritis is probably of malarial origin. Try tablespoonful doses of compound elixir of cincona after meals. A fly blister to the liver is also indicated.

MRS. E. M., Mills Point, Ky.—Leprosy is a contagious skin disease and can be only diagnosed by an examination. It is practically incurable.

MRS. E. W. S., Maggie, Va.—American Oil can be obtained at any good druggist's. If will, no doubt, do you good. You should take plenty of out-of-door exercise also.

MRS. C. S., McCall Creek, Miss.—Gall stones, to effect a cure, must be removed surgically. There is no remedy that will supplant an operation for this condition. Sometimes the use of a large quantity of olive oil seems to be helpful, but in the last analysis, where colics are frequent and the stones are impacted, the only thing is operation.



MRS. J. B., North Loup, Neb.—You may have kidney involment; but from the symptoms given you certainly have infection of the bladder. Get some five-grain tablets of urotropin and take one after meals. Also have the bladder washed out, with a weak solution of permanganate of potassium, daily. Of course the latter treatment must be given by your local doctor, who will determine the strength of the solution to be used. The backache will be relieved by this treatment. External piles, of long standing, can only be cured by operation. If of recent origin, suppositories of ichthyol will give relief. Use about ten grains of ichthyol to the suppository, and introduce, or use, the suppository at night. A hot sitz-bath will also be beneficial, and possibly relieve the bearing-down pains that accompany piles. Of course you must keep the bowels open. One of the best remedies for constipation is compound cascara sagrada mixture.

MISS J. P., Lake City, Minn.—The measurements of a "perfect man" have not been determined. The measurements vary as to height, age, environment, etc. The cure for flat feet is walking "pigeon toed", wearing shoes that are straight on the inside, and shoes that have a flat, wide heel, extending well under the arch.

MISS M. R., Demmon, Mich.—Bunions that are of long standing, are best removed by an operation on or near the joint of the offending toe. One of the best remedies for the local inflammation is ichthyol ointment, applied at night. Of course, one should wear shoes that do not press upon the joint, even if one has to have a special shoe made for this purpose.

Rear Axle

SKIPPING such units as the universals, shafts, etc., the next important assembly in order is the rear axle. It is the final unit of the driving system. Encased so that it is not visible from the outside, is an assembly known as the differential. Due to its being enclosed and giving little if any trouble, this most important element is seldom studied by the average motorist. First, we will endeavor to get an understanding as to the reasons for using this assembly, and, later, go into the construction. Take any four-wheel vehicle and turn a corner. Notice the tracks made by the wheels and you will see that the wheels on the outer side complete a larger arc than do the wheels on the inner side. In other words, the wheels on the outer side travel a greater distance than do the wheels on the inner side. Let us now suppose that no differential was used on the automobile and that the rear wheels were rigidly fastened to the same shaft. Such an arrangement would necessitate both wheels traveling at the same rate of speed. As you can readily prove by noticing the tracks made by a vehicle after it has turned a corner, the inner wheels must complete a shorter arc than do the outer wheels. Therefore, if no differential was used and the wheels were rigidly fastened to a shaft as outlined above, the only manner in which it would be possible to negotiate the turn would be to have the inner wheel lose traction until the outer wheel had completed the large arc. Some types of vehicles do use the "lost traction" method on the turns. Take, for example, railway coaches and street cars. If you will observe closely, you will notice that opposite wheels are fastened to the same axle and that no differential is used. It must be taken into consideration that these vehicles run on steel rails and that there is metal to metal contact between the wheels and rails. At the turns, the inner wheels revolve at the same rate of speed as do the outer wheels, but, due to the slippery rails, no difficulty is experienced, due to the lost traction for the inner wheels. Several manufacturers are adopting a rear axle without differential for their long wheel-base trucks, and from the reports received no difficulty is being experienced with this arrangement. It is true that the inner rear wheel must lose traction at the turn, but, due to the length of the wheel base the action is not severe. Apply the same condition to the average passenger car mounted on pneumatic tires and it will not require a great deal of thought to appreciate the difficulty which would be encountered or the damage done. The natural tendency would be to start a skid, and, not least in importance, it would not require many turns to completely wear away the rubber tread and ruin the tires. Because of the reasons as above set forth, it has been found necessary to use the compensating arrangement known as the differential. For the average passenger car, the rear wheels are mounted on or driven by separate shafts and the differential in the center. By the use of the latter, both rear wheels are assured traction at the turns as the inner wheel is permitted to revolve at a slower rate of speed while the outer wheel is completing the larger arc.

WHEEL TRACKS TURNING A CORNER.

Battery Test Explained

Almost every motorist owning a car equipped with a storage battery has had the battery tested to determine its exact condition. It will be recalled that some of the liquid was taken out of the different battery cells with a syringe in which was a hydrometer. This test is for the purpose of weighing the solution and comparing it with distilled water. For the sake of obtaining a standard, distilled water is considered to weigh "1". The solution in the battery cells consists of sulphuric acid and distilled water. Inasmuch as sulphuric acid weighs more than water, it will be plain that a mixture of the two will weigh more than clear distilled water. A completely charged battery will show a hydrometer test of about 1.280. In other words, the solution taken from the battery as weighed by the hydrometer shows that it weighs 1.28 times as much as clear distilled water. Let us now consider a different condition. The solution when weighed or measured by the hydrometer shows that it is only 1.17 times as heavy as distilled water. A reading of 1.170 indicates that the battery is discharged. One is apt to wonder why the addition of sulphuric acid to the solution will not bring the mixture up to the required weight and produce a fully charged battery. The answer is that the acid does not evaporate. Bear in mind that the original solution weighed 1.280, and, although the test doesn't show it, the original acid is still in the battery. The acid is not in the solution but it is in the battery plates and must be driven back into the solution by charging the battery from an outside source. Unless spilled out, the acid will remain in the battery, and only distilled water should be added in order to keep the battery plates covered with the solution.

Battery Precaution

A normal, fully-charged storage battery will not freeze unless a temperature below 40 degrees below zero be reached. Therefore, it is plain that the best protection against the freezing of the battery is to keep it fully charged. If you do not use your car during the cold weather, it is well to store the battery at a battery shop in your vicinity. However, if such a place is not convenient, first make certain of the condition of your battery. A hydrometer reading of about 1.275 would indicate that the battery is fully charged while a reading of 1.160 or less would indicate almost complete discharge. If you know that the battery is fully charged, you can feel almost certain that the battery will not freeze. It will be well to start the motor at least once a week and allow the generator to charge the battery for a few minutes to compensate for the slow discharge of the battery which continuously occurs.

Anti-Freeze Solutions

Although there are many anti-freeze preparations widely advertised at this season, it is poor practice to accept the claims made for them without first obtaining the opinion of the car manufacturer. Most manufacturers have a chemical laboratory and have already or are willing to analyze the different preparations to determine whether they are satisfactory for the particular make of cars. In the majority of cases, the preparation if used according to directions, will render the cooling system immune to freezing at certain temperatures, but the damage is apt to be done to the radiator or to the motor. Alcohol, either denatured or wood, is safe as an anti-freeze agent, and, to the writer's knowledge, the most satisfactory. This liquid readily mixes with water and has no injurious effects on rubber hose connections, gaskets or metals. However, it does have a low vaporizing point and will, therefore, require replenishing frequently in order to maintain a given specific gravity.

Many inquiries are made each winter concerning the use of kerosene as an anti-freeze agent. Kerosene and water will not mix. You may use half water and half kerosene and yet the cooling system may freeze. When the car is left standing, the two fluids will separate and naturally the water will freeze. Kerosene will not freeze and is sometimes used in the cooling system instead of water. However, it is not to be recommended when alcohol or glycerine are available. Kerosene has a low boiling point and if the car is driven on a mild day overheating is to be expected. Also, kerosene has an injurious effect on rubber and radiators have become clogged due to the breaking away of the material. Another objectionable feature is that the kerosene vapor is inflammable.

Some Useful Pointers

Gear Lubrication

This is the season that particular attention must be paid to the lubrication of the gears in the rear axle and transmission. During the warm weather you might have found a heavy lubricant which was satisfactory but you must now determine what effect the cold weather has upon this particular lubricant. It might happen that the grease becomes so stiff as to permit the gears cutting a path through it, which condition would of course rob the bearings of their required lubricant. Each winter many bearings are ruined due to being deprived of their lubricant. Either thin the lubricant in the cases with kerosene or change to one which is not affected by the cold.

Muffler Explosions

Muffler explosions are usually due to any of the following conditions: Ignition failure, cold motor and sticking exhaust valve. If ignition current is not furnished to a cylinder, the charge will not be exploded and will be discharged from the cylinder into the muffler. The hot exhaust gases from some cylinder which has just fired will follow the mixture into the muffler and cause an explosion at that place. A cold motor acts somewhat the same as ignition failure. Due to the coldness of the cylinder, the charge becomes non-combustible and is discharged into the muffler. Should a cylinder happen to fire, its hot exhaust gases will probably result in a muffler explosion. A sticking exhaust valve prevents compression and therefore a combustible charge is sent into the muffler with the result as above explained.

Right of Way

At some time or other, almost every motorist has met a machine which was driven at right angles to his own and has wondered who had the right of way. Although, to the writer's knowledge, there is no law governing the matter, it is customary to give all vehicles the right of way that are approaching from the right. For example, consider that you were driving down the street and met a vehicle which was being driven toward you on a street at your right. If there is any doubt as to whether you can cross without causing a collision, it is your duty to stop, and give the right of way, for the reason that the vehicle is at your right. On the other hand, if you met a vehicle coming from a street on your left, you have the right of way. The navigation laws form sort of a basis for this custom, they being to the effect that a ship running at right angles to a ship on its starboard must give the right of way to the second ship.

Questions Answered

The description furnished would indicate that the motor continues to run for a time after the ignition current has been switched off. If such is the case, the condition is probably due to a large accumulation of carbon in the cylinders. This carbon will become red hot and cause the motor to continue to run just as if ignition current was being supplied. Have the carbon removed and the valves ground in.

Although the writer never heard of anyone removing carbon by the use of warm vinegar and salt, it has been his experience to learn that there are but two satisfactory ways for ridding the motor of carbon. Scraping is the safest method known. Many manufacturers recommend that the carbon be removed from their motors only by scraping process. If the manufacturer has no objections, the oxygen method will clean the cylinders of all carbon. The chief objection to chemical action, which undoubtedly salt and vinegar has, is that the carbon incrustations break away in rather large pieces, and many times one of these pieces will become trapped under an exhaust valve, necessitating the regrinding of the valve and ofttimes the use of a new valve and recutting of the valve seat.

The chances are that your coil was not burnt out due to having left the ignition current switched on after the engine was stopped, as a burnt-out coil will deliver no current. You state that current is received at times, while at other periods the flow of current is irregular. Would first suggest that you go over the wiring very carefully, looking for worn insulation, touching wires and loose connections. Specially look for loose connections. If an improvement is not then noted, clean the breaker points and make certain they are properly spaced. Bear in mind that a spark may jump the points of a spark plug when it is out of the cylinder, but, due to the resistance in the cylinder, may not jump the points when the cylinder is in place. Do not have the points spaced too far apart. About the thickness of a thin dime is sufficient.

moist and stuck together by a brownish-yellow gummy matter. In the sheath are seen similar evidences of the disease. The general condition is greatly disturbed; the fever is slight, but sheep are depressed and emaciated; lose appetite; are constipated or loose; strain considerable; rapidly become weak and bloodless, with staggering gait. It is an incurable disease.

In all diseases characterized by discharge from the nose, the afflicted animal should be isolated at once and disinfectants freely used. The chief treatment should be good, sound, nutritious food; abundance of fresh air and liberal use of disinfectants. Tonics, such as the elixir of calisaya bark, iron and strychnine in teaspoonful doses three or four times daily in water, adding milk and raw eggs where the patient is weak. Chloride of lime sprinkled in small quantities about the pens also proves useful both as a disinfectant of the floors and of the sheep's nostrils, besides stimulating discharge from the nose.

Keep Your Cows Comfortable

Does it pay to make cows comfortable? Your milk sheet will tell you, if you have one. Just turn the cows out for two or three hours on a cold blustery day and then watch the milk sheet at night. As "sure as preaching" there will be a drop of a pound or two in milk for every cow in the herd. Or try this: Let the tank get filled up with ice and force the cows to drink ice water. Then watch the milk sheet that night. There's no two sides to this question. It does pay to make your cows comfortable.

WARM WATER IS COMFORTABLE TO COWS.—This does not mean hot water but water no colder than it comes from the well. Cows, to give milk, need water and plenty of it. A good dairy cow in full milk needs from 100 to 200 pounds of water a day. She can't drink this much ice water without chilling her badly and taking a lot of energy that should be used in producing milk to warm her up.

TANK HEATERS NECESSARY.—For open tanks in the barnyard a tank heater is necessary. The heater should either be kept going constantly or else the water should be warmed up so that all ice has melted before the cows are let out to drink. With this arrangement, the cows should be watered twice daily, both morning and afternoon, in order that they may drink all they want.

INDIVIDUAL DRINKING CUPS.—A better way is to keep water constantly before the cows. This is best done by the use of individual drinking cups. Many tests have been made by dairymen to determine the actual cash value of drinking cups. One dairyman has shown that his cows produced three pounds of milk each more when water was before them all the time in cups than when they were turned out to a tank. Figure what this means in a herd of twenty cows. Not less than two dollars a day or over three hundred dollars a year at the present price of milk. Since it costs about two dollars a cow to install these buckets, this is a pretty good interest on the investment. This, of course, does not take into account the saving of time by letting the cow help herself to water any time she wants it, or the protection against spread of disease.

GIVE YOUR COWS COMFORTABLE STANCHIONS.—The old-fashioned stiff stanchion is a poor way to tie a cow. An animal kept constantly tied by this method never gets a good rest. Cows sleep naturally with their heads turned around on their sides, but the stiff stanchion prevents this, and cows so tied seldom get a good sleep. The right kind of stanchion to use is the swinging stanchion either hung on a chain or suspended by a swivel so that the cow can turn her head around at will. Cows kept in comfortable stanchions where they can rest at ease are better cows because they will keep in better condition. The better the condition of the cow the more milk she will give.

GIVE YOUR COWS A GOOD BED.—Cows should have a comfortable place to sleep. This means a soft warm bed. A concrete floor is a cold bed. Concrete floors should always be covered with plank under the cows; but plank, while warmer than concrete, are hard without bedding. Every cow should have a soft bed of clean dry straw on which to lie. The stables should be cleaned twice daily so that there will be as little filth as possible piled up behind the cow when she lies down.

COWS LIKE SALT.—Don't forget to salt the cows often. They like it and it makes them drink more water and increases the milk flow. Give the cows plenty of salt and often.

Laxative Foods for Horses

In the feeding of horses the owners must take into consideration the kind and amount of work to be done in making up a ration that will prove at once economical and nutritious. He can afford to feed in one way when the horse is idle or doing light work, but this feeding would be wrong and wasteful of animal tissue if the animal were at hard labor. The food at all times must supply a sufficient amount of material to maintain the horse without loss of weight. This is the food of maintenance. The latter food is sufficient if the animal is doing nothing, but must be augmented whenever the animal is to perform labor or produce a healthy fœtus. Where work is expected every day, the bowels must be so regulated that nothing of value is lost. When the animal is idle, work does not remove any surplus nutrients of the food not required for repair of tissue or actual maintenance. If the bowels in the latter condition should become constipated and the surplus matters be not removed through the kidneys and sweat pores, the liver and kidneys become surcharged and the blood sluggish and impure. These facts show the importance of a right use of succulent food for horses. While the horse is working hard, the succulent food is a positive injury, in that it tends to remove undigested, as a result of laxity of the bowels, food nutrients that are daily required for formation of muscle supply, or vim and vigor, and, in other words, repair of tissue waste.

The Idle Horse

Where, on the other hand, the horse is idle, the succulent food may be and usually is required to overcome the tendency to constipation and its accompanying train of evils. In the former case, the feeding of bran daily would be detrimental; in the latter case, it would be useful and profitable. The hard working horse keeps its bowels in condition by exercise and utilizes all of the food nutrients supplied him so long as his digestive organs are kept in good condition. If he be fed bran daily, he will continually suffer from what may be called sub-acute indigestion and fail to derive the proper amount of nourishment from the sound oats given him in addition to the bran. When Sunday arrives, however, his wonted exercise is stopped and he is unable to throw off the surplus food nutrients not needed by work. If he has been daily fed bran, he will now be liable to suffer from acute indigestion, if given a bran mash. This being the case, the feeding of a bran mash to a horse that has been taking dry bran throughout the week is a dangerous practice.

As to Bran Mashes

When the hard-working horse, not fed upon bran but getting large quantities of oats during the week, is given a bran mash on Saturday night, the effect will be good, and the practice is generally commended. Occasional bran mashes are also excellent for idle horses when fed upon corn, and a small quantity of bran will make the crushed oats fed to colts more effective. We say these things for the reason that bran causes opening of the bowels by irritating the bowels. It is indigestible and passes through the intestines in many cases wholly undigested. It acts as a laxative for the reason that it is a foreign body and is thrown off as useless by the irritated intestines. For this reason it is an excellent preparation for a physic ball, as when fed in the shape of a bran mash without any other food for two or three feeds, the bowels are opened up somewhat and rendered fit for purgative effects of an aloes ball. Carrots act in a somewhat different manner. They do not prove laxative on account of any irritating effect, but on account of real succulence, and have the special power of acting nicely upon the pores of the skin. They may be fed to a horse in poor condition, when bran would only aggravate the impoverishment. Roots are relished by horses, and digestible, but bran must be fed with caution.

Making Barn Work Easy

Is it hard to work around the barn? Well, that all depends. If the barn is properly built, if its furnishings are conveniently arranged, if it is supplied with the proper labor-saving devices, then barn work is easy. No one need dread "chore time" around such a barn.

THE LITTER CARRIER.—About the first thing that a barn needs to make work easy is the litter carrier. But a litter carrier cannot be easily installed if the barn is not built right. In a barn so built that the cattle stand in two long rows with their tails together and a driveway between, a single-track litter carrier is very easily installed. A single-rod track attached to the barn at one end and anchored to the post at the other is all that is necessary to support the basket. If, however, the cattle are arranged in rows facing each other, a rigid track is necessary. With either outfit the barn work is made much easier. The manure is loaded onto the carrier and shoved out into the yard where it may be dumped automatically onto the manure spreader and thus disposed of with one handling. This takes all the backache out of the old-fashioned way of loading into a wheelbarrow and pushing out into the yard. Besides, there is no reloading onto the spreader. The use of the manure carrier is by far the easiest way of cleaning the barn.

THE FEED CART.—Another time and labor saver is the feed cart. All the feed is put in the box at once and easily pushed down the alleyway where it is distributed to the cattle in proportion to their needs. The entire load is taken at once. There is no running back and forth and no heavy carrying. Next to the litter carrier the feed cart makes barn work easier.

THE ADJUSTABLE STANCHION.—Another invention that makes barn work easy is the adjustable stanchion. This makes it possible to line all cows, both large and small, up along the gutter. Instead of being forced to lie in their own filth, they are all kept perfectly clean. Since all droppings fall in the gutter, there is no extra cleaning of the barn required. Neither is there necessity for extra cleaning of the cows before milking. Thus the adjustable stanchion becomes a time and labor saver.

Two New Kinds of Silage

Two new kinds of silage are being tried out somewhat extensively over the United States this year. One of these is made from sunflowers and the other from the leaves of sugar beets. It has long been known that good silage could be easily produced from the waste product of the canning factories, pea vines, but until recently the waste of sugar beet fields, beet leaves, had not been tried.

SILAGE FROM SUNFLOWERS.—Sunflowers have a rank and heavy growth. They produce from 25 to 30 bushels of highly nutritious seed and 15 to 20 tons of stalks and leaves to the acre. This is considerably more than the total yield of corn per acre. It is thought then that the silage made from sunflowers may prove to be a better and cheaper food than corn silage. To test this, many of the experiment stations throughout the Middle West have filled silos with sunflowers. The silage is now being tested by feeding it in comparison with corn silage. The outcome will be watched with great interest, particularly in those localities where sunflowers grow with ease.

SILAGE FROM BEET LEAVES.—In the sugar beet sections beet leaves have been made into silage and farmers are already claiming that beet leaf silage is equal in feeding value to one half its weight of alfalfa hay. In many places the farmers have dug a hole in the earth, lined it with straw and filled it with beet leaves. This valuable feed is now being removed from these pits and fed to stock with remarkable results.

Who Eats Dairy Products?

Cheese Eaters

It may surprise many of us to learn that while Americans are the greatest dairymen in the world, they eat comparatively little of dairy products. According to figures recently announced by the U. S. Department of Agriculture, the Dane is the greatest cheese eater of the world, averaging 12.3 pounds of cheese a year, nearly four times as much as the average American, who eats only 3.8 pounds in the same time. Below is a table showing a comparison on the cheese consumption of the leading dairy countries:

Denmark	eats	12.3	pounds per person yearly.
England	"	11.2	"
France	"	8.1	"
Holland	"	8.0	"
Norway	"	7.1	"
Switzerland	"	5.3	"
Italy	"	4.8	"
United States	"	3.8	"

Where the Butter Goes

Here again the average American is way down the list, at least four other countries having a higher average annual consumption of butter. Here is a list that shows the rank as indicated by the figures of the U. S. Department already referred to:

Australia	eats	25.6	pounds of butter per pound yearly
New Zealand	"	21.7	"
Denmark	"	19.0	"
England	"	19.0	"
United States	"	17.5	"
Canada	"	16.3	"
Norway	"	14.0	"
Holland	"	11.3	"
Switzerland	"	11.0	"
Italy	"	2.1	"

Questions and Answers

FROZEN SHOCK CORN SILAGE.—I would like to know how corn that is frozen in the shock would turn out if I should cut it into silage. How long will it have to lie in the silo before it can be fed to cattle?
J. S., Strandquist, Minn.

A.—Shocked corn makes poor silage, comparatively, but it is better than the dry fodder as a feed for cows. It has to be made wringing wet at time of cutting into the silo and should go through the heating process before being fed. We cannot tell you the exact time necessary to fit it for use as that varies.

BITTER MILK.—Please advise remedy for my cow that gives about a quart of milk at a milking and it is bitter—tastes something like quinine. She will be fresh in February. H. L. W., Hamden, Mo.

A.—Dry off the milk secretion at once and the cow may give good milk when she calves. When a cow has milked for a long time, is nearing calving and gives so little, the milk often is strong, as you describe. It is unfit for use.

BITTER BUTTER.—I have a fine Jersey cow that seems to be in the best of health. She is given a good feed of bran, shorts, oats and corn chop three times a day, and has plenty of hay and fresh water. At times, her butter and buttermilk are so strong and bitter that the butter is not fit for use the next day after it is churned. We churn every other day. Please tell me what is the cause and advise as to the remedy.
F. A. H., Centerville, Iowa.

A.—The cow is not probably to blame for this condition, as bacteria in the milk utensils are the common cause. Exposure of warm milk to strong odors, or feeding strong-smelling and tasting feed, such as old cabbage or roots, also may cause such conditions. Perfectly sterilize all milk utensils and set the cream in a different place. If necessary, get a cream "starter" from the local creamery.

STRONG MILK.—Please tell me what is the matter with my cow. Her milk has a strong taste after standing for a while. She seems to be in perfect health. We first thought it was caused by something she got to eat, but have changed her feed until we know that is not the cause. She was fresh last April and gives as much milk as usual.
D. H., Rockford, N. C.

A.—See answers to two preceding questions regarding "Bitter Butter" and "Bitter Milk." Your trouble probably is due to one or other of the causes there explained. First try the remedy advised in answer to "Bitter Butter."

Mother Pins Her Faith to Musterole

In days gone by, mother mixed a mustard plaster when father had bronchitis or brother had the croup, but now she uses Musterole. It is better than a mustard plaster.

She just rubs it on the congested spot Instantly a peculiar penetrating heat begins its work of healing—and without fuss, or muss or blister.

Musterole relieves without discomfort.

The clean white ointment sets your skin a-tingle. First, you feel a glowing warmth, then a pleasant lasting coolness, but way down underneath the coolness, old Nature is using that peculiar heat to disperse congestion and send the pain away.

Made of oil of mustard and a few home simples, Musterole is uncommonly effective in treatment of the family's little ills. It takes the ache out of grandfather's back. It soothes sister's headache. It helps mother's neuralgia.

Mother pins her faith to it as a real "first aid."

She is never without a jar of Musterole in the house.

Many doctors and nurses recommend it. 30c and 60c jars; hospital size $2.50.

said the second, "but it's all gone. Not only that, but my family is scattered to the four winds."

"So's mine," returned the other. "I lived south of Market Street, but all I saved was this kit of tools."

They looked at each other and smiled wearily, but hopefully. Then, moved by some impulse reaching him out of the distant past, the ruined merchant sang in a low tone, but with thrilling earnestness:

"We have worked out our claims, we have spent our gold,
Our barks are astrand on the bars;
We are battered and old, yet at night we behold
Outcroppings of gold in the stars.
And though few and old, our hearts are bold;
Yet oft do we repine
For the days of old,
For the days of gold,
For the days of Forty-nine."

The words reached farther than the singer knew. A tidal wave of feeling ran through every American in that vast crowd of Orientals. Half a hundred voices united in the refrain:

"And though few and old, our hearts are bold;
Yet oft do we repine
For the days of old,
For the days of gold,
For the days of Forty-nine."

That was the spirit that, even then, while the city was still in the grip of overwhelming disaster, beat in the breast of every citizen. Neil was inspired, and took fresh courage of his despair.

Half an hour later he was among the refugees on Telegraph Hill, searching for that dear, sweet face which had so suddenly been blotted from his sight. The unkind fates still held him in thrall, and he roamed fruitlessly from spot to spot. He heard some one say that the Grand Opera House was afire, that wholesale stores in the vicinity of Clay Street were blazing, and that the homes of the poor in the district south of Market Street could not last long. But he gave little heed to such talk, and took only passing notice of the smoke plumes waving in the sky to the south. His heart was elsewhere.

Which way should he go? To what point, in all that sea of forlorn and drifting humanity, should he carry his search? He felt his helplessness and clenched his hands and groaned aloud.

"Heaven help me," he whispered; "Heaven help and direct my wandering steps!"

So far, he told himself as he descended the slope of the hill, he had but one thing to be thankful for on his darling's account. She had escaped Berdyne. Fearful as it was for her to be alone at such a time, yet that was a thousandfold better than for her to be in the power of such a man.

He tried to assure himself that Beryl would meet with kindly hearted people, who would shield and cherish her. In his dreary rounds he had encountered so much nobility of soul that he felt his lost one must fall into the hands of those who would be good to her.

Once more his aimless wanderings carried him to Portsmouth Square; and then and there came his first gleam of hope. His eyes rested on a form that moved through the throng with unsteady steps; one glance at the face and he would have leaped upon the form like a tiger, had not a quick thought restrained him.

The man he saw was Hartley Trenwyck, the very person who had borne Beryl from the ranch house to the waiting automobile the night before.

The night before! Ah, it seemed like years since the night before!

Neil had known of the lawyer in Denver. His unscrupulous character was no secret. Now he appeared to be looking for something. Who could it be? Intuition counseled patience. Neil drew back and waited, then followed at a distance, hoping the lawyer would lead him to that master rogue whom he served.

For an hour Neil hung upon the man's steps, yet cleverly keeping out of his sight. At the end of that time, the lawyer turned into the house in Sutter Street, closing the front door behind him.

Neil was perplexed by this move. What could Trenwyck be doing in that house when every dwelling in that part of the town had been deserted by its occupants? He resolved to investigate, but to do it secretly.

Window openings gaped in the house walls, but Neil preferred to enter by the door. Running up the steps, he opened the door noiselessly and let himself in.

to care for me until my health was restored. I went to boarding, while he went to work in another State, but he would make a flying visit to see me every month, was good and kind to me all along, gave me everything I wanted but that most precious of treasures—his love. A year passed in this way and although I was not strong, still my health was so much improved that I began longing for my own home again, and we decided to go to housekeeping, and then was when I first learned to dissemble and act the hypocrite to disguise my real feelings. I became his friend, his partner in business and if he needed my services for a few hours with his office work, I cheerfully helped him but I also demanded the money for every hour that I served there. He never heard a word of reproach or complaining, neither did he ever hear a word of love from me. I was so different from the clinging, loving girl of old that I often caught him gazing at me in astonishment. Outwardly, I was a cold, self-reliant woman and a perfect mystery to him. I even went so far as to tell him that my love for him was dead, that I had no other feeling for him save that of a sister, and I acted the "sister" stunt so well that he was completely deceived. I kept my house neat and clean, prepared little extra dishes that I knew he liked, I dressed myself as neat and attractively as I possibly could, always went about singing and laughing as if I had not a care in the world, sometimes remarking, "Isn't it so much pleasanter to live married life as a business proposition?" and he would ask me if I was happy to live without love. I told him I certainly was and wouldn't let myself love again for all the gold on earth, that it was all a mistake to love any one but yourself," and the dear boy would look at me so wistfully I could hardly keep up the pretence. My bluff worked. You see, the nurse went away and married and forgot all about her little flirtation with my husband—just as yours will do if you give her time—and my poor husband sadly missed his wife. He missed my little silly baby-talk to him and the caresses that I used to give. He was tired of the business partner and sister and wanted his wife back again and he began trying to win back what he thought he had lost, and such a courtship as that would make you laugh. I thought how foolish he was in thinking that I had ever ceased to love him. That was years ago and my hair is plentifully sprinkled with grey now and so is his but he is not sure of me yet. I still keep him guessing, and I know without a doubt that he loves me better than he did when I was young and foolish enough to let him know how well I loved him. Cheer up, dear, and get busy, for you can win your husband back to you, for he really doesn't love the nurse; he is just infatuated with her. It is you, the mother of his baby, that he loves. You know that men are only boys all their lives; they never do grow up, and the contrast between a pale, sickly, disheveled and complaining wife and the charms of a healthy, red-cheeked nurse is just more than they can stand and we must not blame them too much for they cannot help it. Stay with him and help him to overcome this little infatuation, and he will thank and bless you and love and appreciate you more than ever—just as my husband does me now.

With best wishes for dear Mrs. Wilkinson and all the COMFORT sisters,

Your sister, POLLYANNA.

BUNKERHILL, M. E. Parsonage, KANSAS. INDIANA:

Dear Friend, I am a subscriber to COMFORT and look for it each month, as it is like a visitor coming. I would like to visit each one of you sisters. This is the first letter I have written to our corner. I want to write to two of the sisters who seem to be asking for advice and womanly sympathy. Indiana, you say you had a trained nurse in your home when you were ill. I was a nurse some years ago, and I would say this: You write to the trustees of the hospital where this woman received her training, and I think they will revoke her diploma; also I would appeal to the club of which you say you are both members. This woman needs to be exposed. A man will sometimes get infatuated with a pretty woman, but the nurse should have complained to you at once of his attentions. If you left your husband to enable him to marry this woman, it no doubt would be the best punishment you could inflict on the unworthy pair. Nothing is so hard for a man or wife to forgive as infidelity. A divorced wife has a hard road to travel. You have your child's future at stake. I am sure your husband is very kind to stay with you out of "regard to what you have been to his children." Men are peculiarly selfish, and others have heart-breaking things to put up with. Twenty years ago in apartments where we lived in Denver, was a lady aged twenty-eight. She was married when she was fourteen to her husband; he met a stenographer in a mining district where he had his office; he would make visits to his wife, would lie on the bed, smoke a cigar, and incidentally curse his wife and tell her to get out. She told me she had married so young she knew nothing but housework and did not feel she could go as a servant at her age in anybody's kitchen, so she stayed, and he was away so much, she went to one of the best stores in Denver, bought expensive clothes and charged the bills to him. Some months later her husband came home, and told her the stenographer was soon to become a mother. The poor wife came to his rescue and brought the girl to Denver and put her in the Crittenton Home. You, poor heart, can now see what some women put up with, who, to all appearances, are happy, well-dressed wives. Stay where you are if you have no way of supporting yourself. You may as well nurse your sorrow at your own hearth as at the hearth of others, who would soon tire of your sad face. Wear your prettiest dresses and sing when he is around, and let him see you are not wearing your heart on your sleeve for him.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

"Arizona. Dear troubled Sister.—I have read your letter with much sympathy. You say your husband is kind; it is not very kind of him to tell you he was happy before he was married. We have been together thirteen years, and you both ought to know each other's good qualities by this time. No, I would not advise you to leave, but I would suggest that you take a month's vacation, and you no doubt will get a letter telling how lonesome he is. Help, these days, is hard to get. A judge in a damage suit said a wife's services were worth ten dollars a week, but we do not get it. You take that vacation and see how things go. Absence works wonders. Men and women have an opportunity to miss each other. You often read in the society column where Mr. So-and-so went to the mountains, and Mrs. So-and-so went to the lakes. They wanted a change. The fact that you live thirty-five miles from town shows that you see too much of each other and need change of scene. Shall be glad to have you write me.

MRS. GILLMORE.

EVANS CITY, PA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

For years I have sat back and enjoyed your talks and reaped great benefits but now I feel I must write a few words of counsel to "A Sister", whose letter appeared in a recent number.

Do not despair for love is really just a small thing after all and man is a fickle animal by nature. My mother always said, "Fields far away look greenest," so try and make yourself look "green." As you say he is always kind to you, it looks as though there were a chance. If he grows tired of your company, then you should grow tired of his or appear to at any rate. My idea would be to have a quiet talk and tell him that as you have lost his love so he has lost a wife. Tell him you will remain and help him all you can with the understanding that you have all the privileges of a servant, for you know, sisters, we wives don't have the same privileges. Give him liberty to go when and where he pleases and with whom he pleases, only reserve the same rights yourself and use them, too. Treat him kindly but at no time show your love. Go whenever possible without considering him. In a few words, "think of yourself first." If there are visits you have longed to make, make them now. He will miss you. Also do lots of fussing with your appearance but do not call his attention to it. Appear to do it for others. If in the course of time his love fails to respond, you had better leave as a life on a farm is a hard life at its best. Don't wait too long but go while the "going's good" as the boys say. Last of all, don't work so hard. A hired girl would not, and think of yourself in that light. Tell him that as his love has changed, so has yours. Sing about your work and appear to be happy with the new arrangement. Read in his presence and make no effort to entertain him and I think in time this will change matters. If not it will be just as well as I believe an unseen power is guiding our lives and that all things work for the good although we may not understand at the time and life is really sweeter for a few ups and downs. Never plead for a man's affections. Be just as cold as he and you will find that it does more good.

Now sisters, this letter is a waste of space to a lot of you and I humbly beg your pardon but I would have written direct to "A Sister" had I known her address. If Wife in Name Only will write me I will try and help her.

With love to all the sisters,

MRS. IRENE NOLSHEIN.

SEVIERVILLE, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

What a host of sisters there are, and a few men, too. Please, Mrs. Wilkinson, don't put me over there by Bachelor Bill for I want to talk with the dissatisfied country girls I see in the corner. I find there are so many of our country girls who don't enjoy country life. Girls, life is just what we make it so we may just as well be happy. The reason so many girls are not satisfied with farm life is because it is all work and no play, and that, you know, makes Jack a dull boy. Let me tell you how the girls of our community are kept happy and yet at the same time are learning to be useful.

We have organized a garden club and have twenty-five members. Every member has a garden all her own and takes all the care of it and does all the work herself, with the exception of the very heavy work and while the young plants are growing this gives the girl an opportunity to learn something new and pass it on to the other girls at the next meeting. We have a meeting every week, either at the schoolhouse or the home of one of the girls, and have a program planned for the occasion which consists of talks by the members on some of the following subjects: The best plans for a garden. The value of labor-saving devices. How I can make my home happier. How I can beautify the home grounds. Needs of an attractive school.

I am giving this, hoping it may be helpful to someone. And at these meetings we learn to sew, patch and darn. The county demonstrating agent visits us every month and we have a fully equipped kitchen at the schoolhouse and we spend a most pleasant day, learning new and better ways of cooking, sewing and doing housework. And when dinner-time comes we have a dinner cooked by our own hands and it is so much fun. At these meetings we plan our picnics, horseback rides, etc., and have some real fun that is denied the city girl. There is no better place to have a good time than on the farm if we will only take advantage of the opportunities. We club girls attend the short course at our nearest town every July and spend three happy days learning to can, cook and sew. Then we meet the other club girls of the county.

And in autumn when our gardens are harvested and canning all done we have a community fair, also a county fair, where prizes are offered for different things and this gives every girl a chance to win some Christmas or pin money. Each club has its own song and yell composed by the members. If a girl is a member of the garden club she doesn't have much time to get blue and worry over the city's attractions, so called.

Girls, get busy, all together, and have a jolly time along with your work. This year the club girls bought a piano for our school and raised the money by pie-and-box suppers and entertainments.

How many have my birthday, February 20th? I would like a postcard shower and will answer all I can.

MISS LENNIS M. RULE.

TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I wonder if you will let me join you a while this evening? I think there are some very interesting subjects up for discussion in the Sisters' Corner.

Pearl Vesey, you certainly do radiate good cheer in your letters. I should like to meet you. George Garrison, I agree with you on the suffrage question and also, like you, think the language doesn't count when we are giving thanks to God. If our heart is right there is nothing else that matters and I think that unless we live in a way that shows our thanks to God, mere verbal thanks are meaningless.

What do the sisters think of the advice George Gar-

Traps and Thrills on an Iowa Trail

CHAPTER VI.

SELLING THE CATCH.

THE fur season came rapidly to a close. With the approach of warmer weather, animals were more active. We took several mink but did not do as well as we had in the fall. When the ice melted and high water spread over the low land, Rock Creek became a torrent. It was only by hard work that we were able to pull up the traps to save them from being washed away.

Our catch was quite large. Like many others, we made a mistake in not selling as soon as the skins were ready for market. It seemed, however, that we could not part with a single hide and gloried in them, as they hung in the shed. We had eighty-nine muskrats, nineteen mink, a raccoon, fourteen civets and twenty-one skunk. The oil we had rendered and hoped to sell was also in our possession; but, notwithstanding the drug clerk's assurance, no one would buy the oil.

The three of us now debated where to dispose of our pelts. About that time, a traveling buyer appeared and purchased St. John's lot. The buyer's name was Steve Machet, and he represented a small concern in a nearby city. The introduction and request that we show him the skins came as a welcome solution to our problem of selling.

How I remember that experience! It was in the evening, and we led the way to the old icehouse with a lantern. Fred, Jim and I were excited, for, if we got our money at once, we could attend a medicine show that was being held at the opera house that night. Without money, our chances were poor.

The buyer evidently was aware of our eagerness to sell. He scarcely glanced at the furs before he began shaking his head, apparently disappointed. Then he commenced to show us the defects. Our mink was not handled right; the skunk had too much meat on them; the raccoon ought to have been stretched more; the civets had no uniformity of shape; something was wrong with the muskrats—in fact, he had us almost convinced that we had not only wasted our time but his as well. Worst of all, it was nearing seven o'clock, and the show started at eight.

"I don't believe I want them, boys," he apologized, shrugging his shoulders. "You realize——"

"But they're worth something," Fred interrupted. "Just take another look and see if you can't give us an offer."

The man hesitated; motioned to me to bring the light closer. He consulted a price-list several times and then began to put down some figures on a piece of paper. Anxiously, my partners and I waited.

Steve finally announced his bid: "Fifteen dollars is all I can pay, and I wouldn't do that except to help you out after you have worked so hard."

It was a bitter pill. Months we had toiled on the line, rising before sun-up and tramping through all kinds of weather to look at our traps. We could not sell for that price and told Machet so.

"You're the judge," was his crisp reply. "Only, if you don't get rid of the lot now they won't be worth a cent in a week or so. I come through here only once a month and by that time—"

He paused suggestively. We trappers looked at one another. "Fifteen dollars was poor pay, yet better than nothing at all. I was going to let the dealer have them, when Fred spoke up.

"SURE THEY ARE," SAID A VOICE.

"We must have twenty at least. We promised another fellow something for helping us with the skunk."

"Yes," Jim seconded, thinking of "Dago" Hoon.

Steve paused; figured again and shook his head. "No," he announced firmly, "they ain't worth it——"

"Sure they are," said a voice.

And, with that, St. John, the old trapper, stepped into the circle of light and pulled a check book from his pocket. "If you don't want this lot at a hundred and twenty dollars, I'll take it myself. And then it'll cost you just a twenty to get 'em from me."

We three owners gasped; almost fell over. Before we had time to recover, the pelt hunter was speaking again. "You know, Steve, the catch is every bit as good as mine, and you paid a hundred and fifty for that. I told the boys how to handle their furs and I won't let you blind them into believing their goods are not worth their price. Now, I ask again, will you take them or not?"

The crooked buyer glared, seemed about to speak, but the words died on his lips. Without hesitating at all, he gave us a draft for our money. Sure enough, the amount read one hundred and twenty dollars.

Fred, Jim, St. John and I worked to help put the pelts in sacks. As soon as our visitor had left, we repaired to the shoe shop to show what we had made. Our benefactor said not a word except that he had helped us get a few dollars more for our lot. We determined not to tell him about what we had asked, fearing ridicule, but at the same time we hardly knew how to express our thanks for the good luck. Instead of four or five dollars each, we had nearly forty after paying the drug clerk as we had agreed.

It was not until years afterward that we learned the truth. The old trapper, it seems, after unjustly accusing us of disturbing his sets, sought to make up for his treatment, especially since we had consulted him so much about fur bearers. He was pleased at the homage paid his knowledge of the great outdoors, and he and McKerron, Sr., often slid into our shed at night to remedy much we had failed to do with the hides. Since we boys did not handle the skins, once they were hung up we did not discover that the two conspirators were working for our interests secretly. St. John had even offered to buy the catch himself, but Jim's father told us nothing of this, preferring to see what kind of a sale we could make. When the dealer appeared, the old trapper had posted himself just outside the door and heard every word that had been said. Then, at the opportune moment he entered and forced Machet to pay us a hundred and twenty dollars instead of the twenty for which we were haggling.

"Steve," McKerron explained, "was just naturally crooked. He saw nothing wrong in almost stealing furs when he knew the owner did not suspect their value. But things are now different, and with the big magazines——"

"True," I replied. "Even a boy who does not know a muskrat from a 'coon can ship to any of the reliable houses advertised in 'COMFORT' and other reliable magazines and be sure of getting what his catch is worth."

"Right you are," was his answer, loading the old briar and shoving the stem between his teeth. "But don't you forget that most of the young pelt hunters are reading these publications, too, and taking no chances, but shipping to reliable houses where they are sure of fair prices.

Naturally, there was nothing left for me to do but agree.

Poultry Farming For Women

unevenly, making it necessary to sort them over often.

Ducks are fit to dress only for a short time. They "go back", as it is termed, for they shed and grow a new lot of feathers, which takes all the fat and all your profit. Hence the importance of turning them into money as soon as possible.

Geese

A goose will lay from ten to twenty eggs and then want to sit; but if you coop her in sight of her companions, four or five days will suffice to break her up. If she lays a third clutch of eggs, let her keep them and sit.

When the weather is mild, set five eggs under a hen; or, if she is very large, seven might be risked. It takes from twenty-eight to thirty days for goose eggs to hatch. As the skin is very tough, it is well to sprinkle a little water around the nest, and even on the eggs themselves during the last two weeks, especially if the weather is dry and hens are doing the incubating.

The youngsters need nothing for the first thirty-six hours. Then feed scalded cornmeal—the coarsest kind—and wheat bran, chopped green clover or young green oats cut fine, tops of green onions, lettuce leaves or any tender young greens.

If the weather is fine, put the coop containing Biddy and her family out on the grass, making a small yard in front for the first few days, to prevent their wandering too far away. Move the coop and yard to a new place as they eat the grass. Like young ducks, their drinking water must be in a vessel that permits them to put the whole beak into the water, or they are apt to get the air passages clogged up with soft food, causing the gosling to smother; but on no account must they be permitted to get their bodies into the water, as they chill and cramp so easily.

It is much better to buy two- or three-year-old birds from a reliable dealer for stock than obtain eggs for setting and wait for them to develop. After the breeding season is over, geese and goslings need little grain if on grass land. Late in the fall, geese do well if turned into the corn stubble or the orchard, where they will clean up all the windfalls—which does much to stamp out grubs and insects.

G. P. P.—I thoroughly considered your account of the different birds, and feel sure that your birds have diphtheria—not roup. Diphtheria is a disease having some of the symptoms of a cold, or of contagious catarrh, but which differs from these and is especially characterized by the development of false membranes on the mucous surface of the nostrils, eyes, mouth, throat, and even of the smaller air tubes. The false membranes are new growths and of a grayish or yellowish color, very tough, and very difficult to remove from the tissues beneath them. The diphtheria of fowls is caused by a filterable and invisible virus, and therefore is entirely distinct from the diphtheria of children, which is caused by a well-known bacillus. The disease is strictly contagious, and probably never develops as a result of exposure to cold or dampness, although these conditions favor its spread and tend to increase its malignancy. The contagion is generally introduced by newly purchased birds which have been to exhibitions and there exposed to sick fowls. Sometimes it is carried by pigeons and other small birds. RITA or, the OUTCAST SISTER

By LIBBIE SPRAGUE PHILLIPS

SPECIAL SALE PRICE with a six (6) months' subscription to THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION ONLY 20 CENTS.
This Book contains one of this noted author's best novels.

Pressed close against the window pane was a wan, white face.

The pathos of this story sweeps all before it. It touches the heart of humanity everywhere. Even the man with a heart of stone learns from this story that deep down under the cold, hard strata of stone, he has in his heart a deep well of human sympathy for the erring one; that he has also a heart capable of love and admiration for the good and noble character of Luella, the gentle, loving, self-sacrificing sister. Righteous indignation is aroused toward Silas Lockwood, her relentless and unnatural father. The heart's emotions like a great ocean billow, rolls our from the beginning to end of the book; when you lay it down and say blessed is God who rules over all for the good of all. Thousands will want to read this book and pass it on to their friends. Libbie Sprague Phillips writes exclusively for THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION; has done so for 10 years. One minister has furnished it with sermons for 13 years; other writers have contributed regularly for years. THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION is 36 years old. The years of continued service of its writers show that our magazine is one of fixed and standard worth. We know you will enjoy reading it. THIS OFFER of magazine 6 months and book, for 20 cents is made to get new trial subscribers. Address break is caused by contagion from an apparently well bird which had the disease and recovered months before. The contagion is spread through the mucous which escapes from the nostrils, or that which is forced out by the acts of sneezing and coughing, in the saliva, the secretions of the eyes, and also the excrement. When the disease appears in a flock, the floors of the houses, the drinking cups and feeding troughs, are at once infected by the diseased birds, and the well ones soon contract the disease from the contaminated water and food. It is consequently but a few days before a large part of the flock shows symptoms, though some are more severely affected than others. Diphtheria begins as a local irritation or inflammation at some point on the internal surface of the mouth, throat, nostril, or eyes. At this time the general health is not yet affected, and there is nothing but the diphtheritic deposit to indicate that the bird has been attacked. This deposit is at first thin, yellowish or whitish in color, and gradually becomes thicker, firmer and more adherent, so that considerable force is required to remove it. The mucous membrane beneath the deposit is found, when the latter is removed, to be inflamed, ulcerated, and bleeding, but it is soon covered by a new deposit. This deposit is called a false membrane, and when it is situated where the air passes over it in breathing, it dries, becomes uneven and fissured, and its color changes to a dark brown. While the false membranes over the parts first affected are becoming thicker, the inflammation extends to the adjoining surfaces, and new diphtheritic centers develop, uniting with each other until the cheeks, the tongue, the palate, the throat, and the inside of the nostrils are covered. Very often the inflammation extends from the nostrils to the eyes and the sacs beneath the eyes, and sometimes it penetrates the air tubes to the lungs or the gullet to the crop. This extension of the disease leads to the appearance of other symptoms. The inflammation in the nostrils causes sneezing and the escape of a thin, watery secretion from the nasal openings; the thick false membranes fill up the nasal passages and the throat and obstruct the breathing; a thick, viscid secretion collects on the eyelids and glues them together; the sacs under the eyes fill up, and swellings are caused which disfigure the head; the poison which is produced by the growth of the microbe beneath the false membranes is absorbed and affects the nervous system, causing dullness, depression, and sleepiness. The affected bird stands with neck extended and the beak open to facilitate the entrance of air into the lungs. At this time, which may be from three to five days from the appearance of the first symptoms, the condition is very serious. Swallowing is very difficult or impossible; the breathing is so obstructed that hardly sufficient air can be inhaled to support life; the head is swollen; the eyes are nearly or entirely closed; the feathers of the head, neck and breast are foul with the decomposing secretions from the nostrils and mouth; there is considerable fever; an exhausting diarrhea sets in; there is rapid loss of weight; the comb and wattles become pale and cold; the temperature of the body finally sinks below the normal, and death soon follows. When false membranes form in the gullet, crop and intestines, there is a rapid aggravation of symptoms, and intense diarrhea, and the escape of blood with the droppings. This type of the disease is more frequent with water fowl than with other birds. Some fowls in a flock are resistant and after a few days of illness make a rapid recovery. Others remain dull, weak and thin in flesh, and may have more or less catarrh and difficulty in breathing for a long time. It is better to kill those affected, bury or burn their carcasses, disinfect the poultry houses and in that way eradicate the contagion as soon as possible, even if the whole flock must be sacrificed. If it is decided to treat the sick birds, they should be removed from the flock and put in a comfortable, well-ventilated room which may be easily disinfected. Make a solution by dissolving two drams of common salt in a quart of warm water, and with a soft brush or pledget of absorbent cotton dipped in this solution gently brush or rub the false membranes until they are disintegrated or loosened from the underlying tissues. Sometimes it is necessary to scrape them off with a spoon or knife, but it must be done carefully so that bleeding will not be caused or the sensitive tissues injured. After the false membrane has been removed, moisten a pledget of absorbent cotton in a two per cent solution of lysol or carbolic acid, and apply it for a minute or two to the diseased surface. A solution which gives good results is made by dissolving 35 grains of chlorate of potash and two grains of salicylic acid in one ounce of water and adding one ounce of glycerine. This may be applied to the diphtheritic spots three or four times a day with a pledget of absorbent cotton. Another solution which is often recommended is made by dissolving 16 grains of permanganate of potash in half a pint of water. A very good and also a harmless solution consists of one and one half ounces of boric acid and one ounce of powdered borax (biborate of soda) dissolved in one quart of water and applied warm. The two last mentioned solutions may be used to wash the eyes or may be injected into the nostrils. If large swellings appear beneath the eyes, they should be opened with a clean, sharp knife, the contents of the cavity removed, and the space frequently washed with the boric-acid solution mentioned above. Many poultrymen think that the treatment is not complete without fumigation. To accomplish this, vaporize tar water or oil of turpentine in the room by dropping it slowly on a hot brick or stone after the doors and windows have been tightly closed. If the operator remains in the room with the fowls, he can easily determine when as much of the remedy has been vaporized as can safely be used and should stop at that point. The tar water is prepared by stirring two tablespoonfuls of wood tar in a quart of warm water and letting the mixture stand for a few hours. The cages and the room in which the sick birds are kept should be disinfected daily with a five per cent solution of cresol or carbolic acid.

E. E. B.—Cabbage, turnips or beets are all good for chickens. As you have no wheat, leave out half the buckwheat, and double the amount of oats, and add one extra part of cracked corn. Barred Plymouth Rocks are good general purpose fowls, but not quite such good producers of eggs as Leghorns, Anconas, or any of the light breeds, but for your part of the country, where the winters are severe, I think you will find them more profitable, as they stand cold weather and farm conditions better than the lighter breeds.

G. K.—The conditions you describe show an abnormal state of the egg organs. It is too involved a subject to treat in this column, but in one of the early spring numbers of COMFORT I will cover the subject fully.

Mother, Why Don't You Take Nuxated Iron

And Be strong and Well And Have Nice Rosy Cheeks Instead of Being Nervous and Irritable All The Time and Looking So Haggard and Old?—The Doctor Gave Some to Susie Smith's Mother and She Was Worse Off Than You Are and Now She Looks Just Fine.

Nuxated Iron Will Increase The Strength and Endurance Of Weak, Nervous, Careworn, Haggard Looking Women In Two Weeks Time In Many Instances.

"There can be no healthy, beautiful, rosy cheeked women without iron," says Dr. Ferdinand King, a New York Physician and Medical Author. "I have strongly emphasized the fact that doctors should prescribe more organic iron—Nuxated Iron—for their nervous, run-down, weak, haggard looking women patients. When the iron goes from the blood of women, the roses go from their cheeks.

"In the most common foods of America, the starches, sugars, table syrups, candies, polished rice, white bread, soda crackers, biscuits, macaroni, spaghetti, tapioca, sago, farina, degerminated cornmeal, no longer is iron to be found. Refining processes have removed the iron of Mother Earth from these impoverished foods, and silly methods of home cookery, by throwing down the waste pipe the water in which our vegetables are cooked are responsible for another grave iron loss.

"Therefore, you should supply the iron deficiency in your food by using some form of organic iron, just as you would use salt when your food has not enough salt.

"I have used Nuxated Iron widely in my own practice in most severe aggravated conditons with unfailing results."

It is surprising how many people suffer from iron deficiency and do not know it. Iron is absolutely necessary to enable your blood to change food into living tissue. Without it, no matter how much or what you eat, your food merely passes through you without doing you good. You don't get the strength out of it, and as a consequence you become weak, pale and sickly looking just like a plant trying to grow in a soil deficient in iron.

If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of ordinary nuxated iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see how much you have gained. Numbers of nervous, run-down people who were ailing all the while have most astonishingly increased their strength and endurance simply by taking iron in the proper form, and this, after they had in some cases been going on for months without getting benefit from anything.

But don't take the old forms of reduced iron, iron acetate, or tincture of iron simply to save a few cents. The iron demanded by Mother Nature for the red coloring matter in the blood of her children, is alas, not that kind of iron. You must take iron in a form that can be easily absorbed and assimilated to do you any good, otherwise it may prove worse than useless.

Dr. Ferdinand King, New York Physician and Medical Author, says that physicians should prescribe more organic iron — Nuxated Iron — for their patients—Anaemia—iron deficiency is the greatest curse to the health, strength, vitality and beauty of the modern American woman. —Sounds warning against use of metallic iron which may injure the teeth, corrode the stomach and in many cases do more harm than good; advises use of only Nuxated Iron.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE: Nuxated Iron which is recommended by physicians is not a secret remedy but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It it dispensed by all other druggists.

26-Piece Table Set

Yours Prepaid For A Club Of Seven

WE have in the past made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7397.

No More Wrinkles

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE

Superfluous Hair Vanishes Like Magic. Eyelashes Beautified

Pimples and Blackheads Removed Forever

Let this woman send you free, everything she agrees, and beautify your face and form quickly.

This clever woman has not a wrinkle upon her face; she has perfected a marvelous, simple method which brought a wonderful change in her face. For removing wrinkles, her method is truly wonderfully rapid.

She made herself the woman she is today and brought about the wonderful change in her appearance in a pleasant manner. Her complexion is as clear and fair as that of a child. She had thin, scrawny eye-lashes and eyebrows, which could scarcely be seen, and she made them long, thick and beautiful by her own methods and removed every blackhead and pimple from her face.

Nothing is taken into the stomach, no common massage, no harmful plasters, no worthless creams.

By her new process, she removes wrinkles and develops the whole figure plump and fat.

It is simply astonishing the hundreds of women who write in regarding the wonderful results from this new beauty treatment, which is beautifying their face and form after beauty doctors and other methods failed. She has thousands of letters on file like the following.

Mrs. M. L. B. Albin, Miss., writes: "I have used your beauty treatment with wonderful success. I have not a wrinkle on my face now and it is also improving my complexion, which has always troubled me with pimples and blackheads. My weight was 112 pounds before taking your treatment and now I weigh 117, a gain of 5 pounds. Your treatment is a God send to all thin women. I am so grateful you may even use my letter if you wish."

The valuable new beauty book which Madame Clare is sending free to thousands of women is certainly a blessing to women.

All our readers should write her at once and she will tell you absolutely free; about her various new beauty treatments and will show our readers:

How to remove wrinkles in 8 hours;
How to make long, thick eyelashes and eyebrows;
How to remove superfluous hair;
How to remove blackheads, pimples and freckles;
How to remove dark circles under the eyes;
How to quickly remove double chin;
How to build up sunken cheeks and add flesh to the body;
How to darken gray hair and stop hair falling;
How to stop forever perspiration odor.

Simply address your letter to Helen Clare, Suite A 252, 3311 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill., and don't send any money, because particulars are free, as this charming woman is doing her utmost to benefit girls or women in need of information which will add to their beauty and make life sweeter and lovelier in every way.

rison gave to those fine modest young ladies that Old Maid spoke about? I don't think he really meant it. Now, honest Injun, George, if you had a sister would you want her to take a leaf out of the average fifteen-year-old girl's book and play the game as she does? I don't think you would. I think the parents are to blame in either extreme. They should teach their girls to treat their boy friends with the same degree of friendliness that they do their girl friends.

Will leave my name and address with Mrs. Wilkinson should anyone care to write to me.

JUST A GIRL.

OHIO.

DEAR OLD COMFORT FRIENDS:

We have had COMFORT in our family for a great many years. My little boy used to take it and he belonged to Uncle Charlie's Club. He is now grown to manhood and lives in the city but still clings to COMFORT. I get the paper in the old home and send it to him after I read it. Thus it does double duty. I hardly know what part I like best as I read it all. I think Uncle Charlie a fine man and I remember once when people were talking about who should run for President my little boy said, "Mamma, do you know who I want for President?" When I told him I did not know he said it was "Uncle Charlie, of course," so you see he was one of the great men with the little folks as well as with us older ones. He certainly has done and is doing great good for mankind. May Heaven bless him in his work and give him strength to go on as he has been doing for the right, no matter what his enemies may say or do. I enjoy the Sisters' Corner almost as much as I do Uncle Charlie's department and read all the letters, also the letters from the men. I think theirs are mostly all talk for we surely know they respect and admire the women they criticize, for their mother was a woman, and there is no man living who does not respect and love his mother.

To the dissatisfied women, I would say: Don't air your troubles before the whole world. I find we get more comfort and sympathy near home. Do the best you can and don't exaggerate Hubby's little faults. We are far from being perfect ourselves.

Love to all. YOUR COMFORT SISTER.

LITTLETON, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have taken COMFORT for years and love it dearly. I believe in marriage for love. If a woman marries a man she does not love and he is good and kind to her and does everything to make her comfortable, I think it is unreasonable and foolish for her to always bemoan her fate and say they are ill mated. How much better it would be to learn to love him.

How would you feel if you had a husband that came home drunk and spent all the money? If a wife is to share her husband's joys and sorrows, is she not entitled to share his money? Yet how many husbands come home and say they made a certain amount in the past week and give their wives half of it? Not one in a thousand does that.

I have received many helps from COMFORT and want to pass along a hint about baking bread. I use the oil stove and as my oven does not bake very well I often bake it in the skillet. I make my dough soft, as for muffins, grease the skillet and flour it, pour the batter in and cover it. Do not have too hot a fire. Before long it will be ready to turn. I use the batter cake turner for this.

If any soldier who reads this was in the 4th Iowa Cavalry, commanded by Colonel, afterward General E. F. Winslow, who went through Mississippi in 1863, please communicate with me as there is a matter of history that I want to get. MRS. B. H. WEAR.

HUNTINGTON, 510 Moore St., PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL:

Four years have passed since I wrote you and if it isn't asking too great a favor I should like to call again.

First, I wish to thank all the sisters who have written to me. I am very, very sorry that I couldn't answer all the kind and interesting letters, but time would not permit. If you don't object, I would like to sit down beside Bill and make a few comments on his letter.

All inventions have been improved upon. Man was made first, then woman. Why shouldn't she be an improvement? I've been on this universe thirty-five years and I find it requires a lot of tact and broad-minded views to please the whims and fancies of the average man. Believe me, old maids, as "some folks" vulgarly call them, have nothing on the men.

Speaking of dainty toilettes, they are very desirable if one can afford them, but why shouldn't a beautiful character appeal more to a man? Some beautiful gems are encased in very plain settings. Humanity in general reminds me a great deal of the good farmer's winter apples. Some are sound as a silver dollar all through; others beautiful to look upon, but rotten at the core; others, alas, rotten all the way through.

When two men form a partnership, the profits are divided equally, but when a man takes a wife for a life partner, he puts the profits into his own pocket and when the wife needs a new suit he comments on it until she loses heart and often goes without it.

Now that the war is over, we should not let our patriotism diminish. The increasing demand in the cities for the necessaries of life should encourage us to save all that we can. Let us teach our children the meaning of true patriotism. It is not only marching in a parade and floating the colors, but living up to what the colors indicate. It can easily be done by teaching them to be courteous, truthful, honest, and keeping the lawns and surroundings free from litter.

To those of you who are thinking of taking a little child to care for as your own, it is a noble work but can you give it the loving care and devotion you would a child of your own? Children are so thoughtless and yet so loving that they should be carefully guarded. The impressions that we leave on the childish mind are often lasting and I think we should not forget that the lessons we impart to them in childhood is fitting a child for a future citizen of the United States, a soul for immortality. Even parents sometimes slight obligations to their own children. I once heard the remark: "Let children dig for themselves, the same as we did." I think children should be taught to help themselves; the saying that "steel tempers steel" is a true one but yet, I think we should help our children to help themselves. A carefully trained child does not often become ungrateful. We speak of the care that our children bring to us but do we ever stop to think of what we owe to our children? We are responsible for their existence; they must bear our name; it should be an untarnished one. Their home, no matter how lowly, should be a happy, well-managed one. I think they should also be taught the value of money, and how to spend it wisely.

Best wishes to all. MRS. R. K. WEAVER.

Comfort's League of Cousins

he was so busy trying to step on Kaiser Bill's corn that he did not have time to write. Mr. Burleson ought to use him to advertise the efficiency of the postal service. Possibly, however, your brother was at fault. He may have thrown his ink bottle at the Germans and thus have been unable to write. As regards the songs, I'm sorry to inform you that the "Texas Cowboy" no longer exists. He uses an automobile, and "Nellie Gray" is now Nellie Red. She is so daubed all over with red paint like so many other girls that no one will ever again recognize her or care to sing about her. Nellie has gone red, she's a Bolshevik and that settles her so far as I am concerned.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for February

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these ye have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.

Dortha Grigg, Glen Allen, Ala. Shut-in. Aged mother her only support. Poor, sick and suffering. Send her some of the sympathy that buys bread. Well recommended. Marguerite Nowen, Henrietta, Ky. Blind for several years. In very needy condition. Would appreciate second-hand clothing and financial assistance. Postmaster recommends her highly. Laura Jones, Cambria, Va. Crippled from birth. Aged mother her only support. Send her some cheer. W. B. Ballew, Sparta, Tenn. Helpless invalid. Well recommended. Sad case. Send him some substantial cheer. Jeff Collins, Tomahawk, Ky. Crippled. Unable to work. Has three children too small to earn anything. Would be glad of second-hand clothing and any assistance you care to send. Miss Susan Agee, Spencer, R. R. 1, Box 41, Va. Sick, blind, poor and needy. Do not pass her by. Mrs. Kate Coleman, Price, R. R. 2, N. C. Helpless from rheumatism. Would appreciate quilt pieces, second-hand clothing and any help you care to send her. Earl H. Craft, Paris, Box 251, Mo. Had both legs amputated twelve years ago. Would appreciate cheery letters. Geo. Lee Hurt, Fort Payne, R. R. 3, Ala. Littled crippled boy, 14 years of age. Would appreciate letters and postal picture cards and anything to help pass the time. Mrs. Beulah Moore, Campbell, N. C. Invalid. Would like reading matter, especially books.

The poor souls whose names are listed above are in too desperate need to care for anything but substantial financial aid. They cannot eat or wear sympathy, and they despise tracts. Fork out your silver or your currency, it is the only thing that goes with God or man. Sympathy with cash makes a splendid combination, but sympathy without cash cuts no icicles. Do to others as you would have them do to you.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C." a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

A few drops of vinegar added to frosting keeps it moist.

If your curtains do not draw easily on rod, rub with paraffin.

Mildew on leather can be removed by rubbing with vaseline.

To keep apple butter from scorching while cooking, put ashes under kettle.

Add a little bluing to the water used in washing glass of any kind and it will be much clearer.

Rapid boiling destroys the flavor and spoils the color of vegetables.—MRS. ROBERT R. GOLDEN, Cornell, Wis.

When making sausage add a level teaspoon of ginger to each gallon of sausage. This makes it more easily digested.

Try cleaning an iron bedstead with soda and vinegar. Rub on with cloth and then wash off.—WILD ROSE, Missouri.

Rub French chalk on both sides of grease spot on table-cloth and let remain a short time. When brushed off, no trace of grease remains.

Face one end of a quilt with a piece of cloth six or eight inches wide. When this is soiled it can be ripped off and laundered and the quilt will remain clean.

Put a tape or braid onto children's mittens, just long enough to go into the sleeves and around the neck and reach the hands comfortably. The children will have no trouble then in finding them.

Have a high-chair or stool in your kitchen and use it whenever doing work that can be done sitting. Four wooden-tipped bumpers for a door, screwed into the legs of a chair will often make it the desired height. A small table can be raised in this manner.

If you use roller towels, divide them into several parts by sewing across with colored, fadeless thread, and mark initials of each child in each space. In this way each child has a separate towel and you can make them wash cleaner by telling them to see whose towel stays cleanest the longest time.—TOPSY TUEVY JOE, Mich.

Remedies

CHILBLAIN CURE.—Spirits turpentine, one ounce; sulph. acid, two drams; olive oil, two and one half ounces. Mix and apply to affected parts two or three times a day. Be sure and mix sulp. acid and olive oil first and then add turpentine.

ASTHMA.—Stramonium leaves, two ounces; digitalis leaves, one ounce; henbane leaves, one ounce; saltpeter, pure, three quarters ounce. Rub the leaves together, dissolve the saltpeter, saturate the leaves with the saltpeter solution. If not enough saltpeter, it will not burn; if too much, it will burn rapidly. A tablespoonful should be ignited and the fumes inhaled. The bowels should be kept open.

EARACHE REMEDY.—Olive oil, one ounce; laudanum, 20 drops. Mix, shake before using. Put about one half teaspoon of above mixture into teaspoon and warm over lamp or stove, just warm, not too hot. Then pour into the ear and put cotton in ear to prevent remedy from running out.—MRS. OWEN GRUBLE, Shrewsbury, W. Va.

I would like very much to have the song, "Lorrena."—EVALYN MAXWELL, Fair Oaks, Ark.

Would like to exchange plants with the sisters.—MRS. E. W. HIGGINS, Ferguson, N. C.

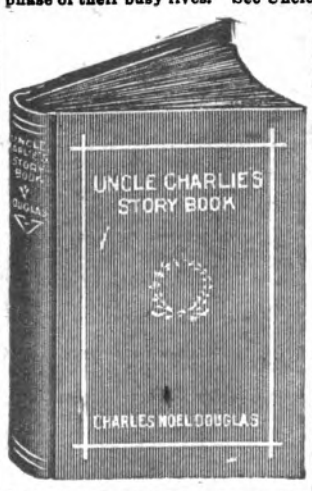
I would like to get the August, 1918 and 1919, also Sept., 1919, numbers of The Illustrated Companion. Will return favor. Write first.—MISS MARIE CHURCH, Nowlin, Box 24, S. Dak.



Will someone send me the two poems, beginning, "A painter stood in his studio, his gaze with wonder bound," and, "Hear the bells whose humid measure fall upon the startled ear." Address after March 1.—MRS. L. EMMA SMITH, Charlotte, 417 N. Clinton St., Mich.

Three Wheel Chairs in January

538 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three January wheel chairs go to John W. Powell, R. R. 2, Vineland, N. C., 22; Mrs. Nannie Shipley, R. R. 2, Box 28B, Piney Flats, Tenn., 86; Ferris Byrd, R. R. 1, Steele, Mo., 86.

The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

John W. Powell, age 72, is crippled by total paralysis of one side of his body. The wheel chair will be a great comfort to this old gentleman and a help to his good wife in caring for him, as he is entirely dependent on her in his helpless condition.

Mrs. Nannie Shipley, age 50, is crippled by broken hip. Two years ago a horse ran away with her; she was thrown out of the buggy and suffered a bad fracture of the hip bone. She writes that she needs a wheel chair but doctor's bills and expense of hired help have put them so far behind that she is not able to buy one. This COMFORT chair will be a blessing to her.

Ferris Byrd, age 7, is deaf, dumb and blind and crippled from birth, so that he has never walked. His mother writes me that he can not even sit up alone and is entirely helpless. She says that the chair will be a comfort to him and a great help to her.

Our Wheel-Chair Club is doing a splendid work in helping needy shut-ins to obtain much needed wheel chairs, but its work ought to be extended, for there are so many cripples that need its help to procure these necessary accessories to bring a ray of hope and comfort into their desolate lives. I appeal to all who enjoy the blessing of a sound body to do your best to help the cause.

The letters of thanks and the Roll of Honor that follow will interest you.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Delighted with Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

Caddo, Okla.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I received my rolling chair today, and am delighted with it. Many, many thanks for same. Very respectfully,

(Miss) Mary East.

Her COMFORT Wheel Chair a Godsend

Pulaski, Tenn.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

The wheel chair came as a surprise and mother was so glad that she had to take a ride as soon as it was uncrated. She says it is a godsend to her. When the weather is too cold for her to go outside she can go to the dining-room in her chair. Accept our thanks and please excuse delay in acknowledging your kindness. I had expected that in August, when we farmers got through with our crops I would then be able to send in some more subscriptions to help on the Wheel-Chair Club, but instead the doctor was called for me and found it necessary to take me to the hospital for a surgical operation—in fact a second operation had to be performed—and I am just getting on my feet again.

Sincerely yours,

J. H. McGaugh.

The Key to Happiness and Success in over a Million and a Quarter Homes

MARCH
1920

And softly came the fair young queen
O'er mountain, dale and dell;
And where her golden light was seen
An emerald shadow fell.
The good-wife opened the window wide,
The good-man spanned his plow;
'Tis time to run, 'tis time to ride,
For Spring is with us now.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Government Officials Apprehend Grave Consequences of Farm Labor Situation

WHAT if the farmers should strike? What even if they should follow in the footsteps of industrial laborers only so far as to cut their hours of labor to match the work-day scale now prevailing in most all other employments? Obviously the answer to the first question is that the world would starve. As to the second proposition the answers of the farmers themselves virtually admit that the result would be higher prices and a distressing shortage of food. And yet they assert that, although they are not disposed to profiteer by striking and have no desire to curtail production, the latter course is being forced on them by conditions beyond their control, chiefly the labor situation.

Ample premonition of the tendency of industrial and economic conditions to impair agricultural activities was repeatedly given during the past year in the resolutions and memorials adopted by national conventions of the Grange and other farmer organizations, but passed unheeded by the general public and failed to evoke remedial action on the part of those who were responsible for the trend of affairs. But the general attitude of the farmers in all sections as disclosed by their answers now pouring into Washington at the rate of a thousand a day in response to the two hundred thousand questionaires sent out by the Government is regarded with grave anxiety by public officials and is making thinking people sit up and take notice. These questionaires requested suggestions as to how the Post-Office Department might aid in cutting down the cost of living, and were sent broadcast to farmers all over the country.

The information referred to reached the public through a carefully prepared report made by the Post-Office Department and read, on January 30, by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General before the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The report summarized the views expressed by more than forty thousand farmers in the replies received prior to that date. While a small percentage of the answers were from well-satisfied farmers, the prevailing tone of a large majority, as summarized by the officials, reveals a wide-spread spirit of unrest and dissatisfaction among farmers throughout the land. Their chief complaints come under the two following headings:

Shortage of Farm Laborers

THEY say that their former hired help and even the farmers' sons and daughters have been lured to the cities by high wages and short work days to an extent that compels a large reduction in farming operations, which, of course, will result in a corresponding diminution of farm products. They cannot obtain the man power to work the farms to normal capacity is their claim. With scarcity food prices naturally will rise, for the farmers must make a living by a larger profit on smaller production, and if, as intimated in some of their replies, they adopt the industrial laborers' policy of higher pay for shorter hours and less work the food problem of the cities will be still further aggravated. The farmers protest against the short hours of labor prevalent in manufacturing industries because the increased cost of production is reflected in the prices they have to pay for goods, and they say they are tired of working fifty to a hundred per cent. more hours a week than the rest of the community in order to keep down the price of food.

Middlemen's Profits Too Large

THEY claim that the wholsalers, retailers and other middlemen through whose hands farm produce passes exact extortionate profits to the detriment of both producers and consumers, and urge the necessity of more direct, efficient and economical agencies of contact between the farmer and the consumer. As in many localities the farmers have lowered the cost of their purchases through the Grange stores or other cooperative means of buying it seems probable that the middlemen and their profits might, to a large extent, be eliminated by establishing cooperative markets for the sale of farm and dairy products in the cities and towns, and some of the answers offer suggestions of municipal or community assistance in maintaining such markets.

Some Interesting Extracts from the Farmers' Replies

THE following extracts from a number of replies taken at random from the more than forty thousand then on file in the Post-Office Department illustrate the trend of thought agitating at least a considerable portion of the farmers in the East, the South and the Middle West.

A Palmyra, Mo. farmer wrote: "I almost fear a famine. Farm help everywhere is flocking to the city, lured by short hours, high wages and the promise of a good time. Someone, I fear, is going to suffer if this condition is not remedied shortly."

Another Missouri farmer, who blames the middlemen for the high cost of living and suggests the establishment of municipal markets to be served by parcel post direct, said in his letter: "I sell butter to the dealer for 45 cents a pound, and the same butter sells to the consumer for 80 cents a pound. In the distribution we lose nearly half and we lose money on the butter at the first price. Such conditions are causing the farmers to leave the farms by the thousand. We have reached a crisis. You may ask what we would do with the middlemen. I will suggest that it be arranged for them to go on the farm and help produce things. I understand that they might not relish working 14 hours a day, but if we get by the near future there will have to be some useful work done by everyone."

An East Chatham, N. Y., farmer wrote: "The time is very near when we farmers will have to curtail production and raise only what we need for our own use and let the other fellows look out for themselves. Labor unions are more to blame for the high prices than anyone else. People are trying to get pay for what they don't earn."

Declaring that he works a 240-acre farm without help and that hundreds of other farmers are doing the same, a Revere, Mo., man declared that "the place to start to lower the cost of living is to cut the wages in the city, which have called our farm help there. We need them on the farm to help increase production and then we can cut the cost of living."

"The time is coming if not here," another letter declared, "when the consumer and farmer will absolutely have to deal direct with one another. The middleman wants a larger profit than we are getting while at the same time the farmer does the hard work."

A letter from a Hagerstown, Md., farmer read: "To reduce the cost of my foodstuffs to the consumer you must first furnish me with first-class labor at reasonable wages and second, you must eliminate thousands of middlemen who are robbing the people wholesale."

"The price of everything the farmer has to buy is still going up and the quantity we can raise and put on the market is steadily going down," a Missouri farmer wrote. "I am a small farmer and don't know much else. We are all loyal citizens, but there is an awful uneasiness."

An official who had looked over the replies said they indicated that a large percentage of the writers contemplated curtailment of acreage under cultivation.

Commenting on the replies, Assistant Postmaster-General Blaksleo said: "Such a condition at a time when the predominant cry is for production and still more production cannot but constitute a grave menace."

The Proposed Remedy

IN a statement given out for publication on February 2, Sherman J. Lowell, Master of the National Grange, declared that it was the belief of the farmers of the country that the only way to reduce the cost of living was for everyone to be willing to do a "reasonable day's work," and that the forty-four-hour week would never support even America. Regarding the remedy for the present situation Mr. Lowell advised that "five very definite things" may be expected in time to have a beneficial effect on the world's food production:

"1—A more direct and less expensive system of distribution.

"2—The removal of all artificial restrictions upon the sale of farm products.

"3—A lengthened industrial day with honest service for wages paid.

"4—Increased dividends on farm investments which will enable their owners to meet the wage scale of competing occupations.

"5—Increasing social and educational privileges in rural communities."

Our newly appointed Secretary of Agriculture, Edwin Meredith, has long been in close touch with the farmers and farming interests in his capacity of publisher of a prominent farm journal. On February 2, when he took the oath of office as Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Meredith recommended, as a remedy for the high cost of living, the elimination of useless employees in non-productive business, the speeding up of all lines of industry commensurate with the present activity of the farmers, and that retailers and jobbers be permitted to exact only a reasonable profit.

"The high cost of living problem," Mr. Meredith asserted, "cannot be solved through the efforts of one class but all business and all labor must recognize the solution as a common duty or less and less will there be of farm produce to distribute among the people, and higher will go the price of that which is produced.

"The farmers of America are willing to assume their part of the responsibilities as American citizens in meeting any problem threatening the welfare and stability of our country but this high cost of living problem is a mutual one and they ask that it be approached by all the people as a common problem.

"Business men must look to the operation of their establishments and see that no useless employee is retained to add to the cost of distributing what the farmer now produces. Useless employees must be released from non-productive work that they may go into productive work and add to the sum total that may be distributed among all."

This perpetual merry-go-round of raising wages in the vain attempt to overtake prices gets nowhere, and it never can. As fast as wages are raised prices go up in proportion. How can it be otherwise when labor is eighty per cent. of the cost of production? Strikes, idleness and shorter working days not only increase the cost and raise prices but also reduce production and cause scarcity; that is the chief ailment of the world today. The farmers are right in their diagnosis and in the remedy they propose—to cut out profiteering middlemen and speed up production by making everyone give "an honest day's work for an honest day's pay"—and they say it must be done or we shall face the penalty of a food shortage and higher prices.

His Heart's Queen

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

She resolutely concealed her feelings and began to remove her hat and ulster.

A woman of perhaps thirty years entered, bearing a tray.

"Who can she be?" whispered Lord Cameron to Wallace.

Mrs. Van Vort readily complied with his request.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

On a car, going up a steep hill, leading to the Zoological Gardens of Cincinnati, is Violet Draper Huntington. Opposite her sits Wallace Richardson. Nearly at the top of the hill, something beneath the car breaks. Wallace seizes Violet's hands and locking them behind his neck commands her to cling. The car crashes down, burying all the passengers beneath the ruins. They are the only two alive and hurried to Wallace Richardson's home, are cared for by his mother. Mrs. Mencke, Violet's sister provides a nurse and leaves orders for Violet to see no one. The nurse out for a walk, Violet goes to the adjoining room to meet Wallace and thank him for the life saved. As they become more friendly, Wallace realizes his danger and Violet is hopelessly in love. Violet asks Wallace to come with his mother to see her. Mrs. Mencke takes Violet to Saratoga for two months, then to Cincinnati, and home. The following day, picking up a paper, Violet reads of Mrs. Richardson's death. She goes to the Richardsons' house and expresses her sympathy to Wallace, who unconsciously calls her my darling, and asks her forgiveness. As she whispers, "I am glad," he knows she is all his own. Returning home, her sister demands where she has been, and learning it was at Mrs. Richardson's funeral, that she rides in the carriage with Wallace and Mrs. Dent, Mrs. Mencke denounces it as questionable and that she must drop him for all time. Wallace, calling upon Violet, Mr. and Mrs. Mencke return and she introduces him and admits he is her promised husband. She overhears Belle's and her husband's scheme to place her in a convent. Mrs. Mencke, proposing a trip to Montreal, Violet refuses to go, and Mrs. Mencke takes Mrs. Hawley, who is to sail for Europe and chaperone Nellie Bailey, into her confidence and requests her to induce Violet to join them. Violet makes ready for the proposed trip and Wallace is at the steamer to say good by. Vane Cameron and Ralph Henderson join Mr. and Mrs. Hawley's party and before the voyage is over Vane Cameron surrenders his heart to Violet. Mrs. Mencke schemes that no letters pass between Violet and Wallace and later, joining the party in Europe, gives her permission for Vane to win Violet. Failing to get Violet's consent, she produces a notice of Wallace Richardson's death, which throws Violet into a severe sickness, leaving her sad and heartbroken. She confesses to Vane her love for Wallace Richardson, her sister's opposition, concealing nothing. Knowing she is unhappy from causes other than Wallace's death, Vane urges her to allow him to give her his name, to shield her from sorrow and care. Violet, afraid to yield, hesitates, but later she consents to what he thinks best, but with many misgivings. Mrs. Mencke, entering Violet's room, finds the bed made and the room in order and no trace discovered of her. Four weeks later, Lord Cameron sees the body of a woman upon the beach clad in dark grey suit with bands of blue silk. Believing it is Violet, he selects a spot near the sea for burial. The next day a stranger appears and requests to meet the woman reported to have married Lord Cameron. Being questioned by the Menckes his right, he produces the marriage certificate and Vane Cameron confirms it by Violet's admission of it to him, the treatment received, her disappearance and later the finding of her body by drowning and the burial. Wallace falls unconscious and Lady Cameron and Vane remain with Wallace through a severe illness, after which he returns to New York, building up a fine business. In the meanwhile, Wilhelm Mencke squanders all at the gaming table and Mrs. Mencke goes to Cincinnati from which place she suddenly disappears. Violet comes to New York, securing a position as governess for Bertha Lawrence, who is partially blind and possessed of a strong will. She wins her affections, Mr. Lawrence treating her as a member of the family, and alone with himself determines to win Violet. Wilhelm Mencke secures Violet's address and learns that Wallace Richardson is in the city. Calling upon him and desiring to raise money, he offers Violet's jewelry for two thousand dollars. Wallace objects. As the husband of Violet, he is the legal heir and will give a sum which may be named as their value and fifty dollars. Jonas Huntington dies, leaving a fortune to his niece, Violet Huntington. She, supposed to be dead, the nearest heir is Mrs. Wilhelm Mencke, for whom search is being made. Wilhelm Mencke, to secure this property, schemes to get Violet in his power. He haunts Fifth Avenue and learns of her movements. Bertha Lawrence, meeting with an accident, is lovingly cared for by Violet, until her death, after which she proposes to look for employment. Mr. Lawrence, in his gratitude, desires to adopt her as his daughter and heiress. Violet, going out at dusk, is accosted by Mencke. She steps around the corner of a street, when she is suddenly seized and thrust into a carriage.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VIOLET BECOMES A PRISONER.

"WHAT do you mean, Wilhelm Mencke, by treating me in this shameful manner?" Violet demanded, indignantly, as she sank, panting, upon the seat opposite, and as far away from her companion as possible, her eyes blazing, her whole attitude expressive of mingled anger and loathing.

The man laughed, a low laugh of amusement and triumph, for he had succeeded in his scheme so much more easily than he had anticipated, notwithstanding he had been obliged to wait so long to carry it out, that he was very much elated.

"It means, my pretty little sister-in-law, that I have long been pining for your charming society, which you have been bestowing of late upon that rich old codger up yonder, and I propose now to have you devote a little of it to me, who am your legal guardian," he replied.

"You are no longer my guardian; I repudiate you and your authority!" Violet cried, spiritedly.

"According to the will of your father, you do not reach your maturity until you are twenty-one, and nearly a year will have to elapse before your next birthday," Mr. Mencke calmly returned.

"You were simply appointed the guardian of my property, and not of my person," Violet retorted; "and I demand that you release me instantly. I will not suffer such an indignity—to be carried off forcibly like this. You have squandered all my fortune, so there is nothing now for you to guard, and I am abundantly capable of taking care of myself. Let me out immediately, Wilhelm," and forgetting her promise in her excitement, she turned to the window and began beating upon it to attract attention.

Wilhelm Mencke seized her hands and pushed her rudely back upon her seat.

"Stop that!" he cried, fiercely, or it will be the worse for you. You promised you'd keep still, and you must do it, or I'll gag and bind you."

Violet saw that it would be useless to try to escape from his power now, and so, rather than be gagged and bound, she resolved to make the best of her disagreeable situation; at least until the carriage should stop, when she hoped to attract the attention of some policeman or passerby.

"Release my hands!" she commanded, authoritatively.

"Will you keep still?"

"Yes."

He released her again, and she shrank away from him with a shudder of repulsion.

"I cannot understand your object in kidnapping me in this unhuman style," she resumed; "you certainly cannot have anything to gain now that my money is all gone, while you are liable to get yourself into serious trouble by such an act of violence."

"Your latter statement I admit, Miss Huntington," her companion responded, ironically. "I am liable to get into trouble, but I have taken every precaution to avoid any such result, while what I am to gain remains to be seen later."

"If it is money that you want, Wilhelm, I will give you every dollar I possess if you will take me home," Violet said, appealingly, and trembling with nervous anxiety, for she saw that they were now being driven through streets that were ill-lighted and almost deserted.

"How much do you possess, Violet?" Wilhelm Mencke inquired, with some curiosity.

"I do not know exactly, but I have saved nearly the whole of my salary since I have been with Mr. Lawrence."

"How much did he pay you?"

Violet named the sum that she received, and the man laughed aloud in derision.

"Pretty well—pretty well, I must admit, for a little girl who never lifted her hand before to do anything for herself, and who always had all the money that she wanted to spend for the asking," he said, while his fat sides shook with irrepressible mirth. "Really, Violet," he added, sarcastically, "your tastes must have changed immensely if you have been content to get along with that sum. But it has no temptation for me, as I hope to realize many times the amount by this lark."

"How?" Violet inquired, in surprise.

"Well, in more ways than one. I have been told that the rich old banker is very fond of you, so probably he will offer a handsome reward for news of you when he discovers that you are missing."

"Shame! shame on you, Wilhelm Mencke! Have you fallen as low as that? Is it possible that you will descend to such an act of meanness to get money?" Violet cried, her voice ringing with scorn.

The man flushed hotly, for her words stung him, low as he had fallen.

"A man must live," he muttered, sullenly.

"A man will work for himself," the young girl retorted, contemptuously; "none but leeches, parasites, or vampires will prey upon others in such a way."

"Your tongue, my pretty sister, has lost none of its sharpness since your decease. Pray, is this the style of conversation that you have indulged in since you entered the heaven of Fifth Avenue?" Wilhelm Mencke questioned, with a sneer.

Violet made no reply; she saw that it would be useless to contend with him regarding her release, and since she had no fear that he would do her any personal injury, she resolved to appear to submit to the inevitable and watch her opportunity to elude or outwit him.

The carriage now turned into a darker and narrower street, and the driver slackened the pace of his steeds.

Presently he stopped, but as the carriage came to a halt, Mr. Mencke leaned forward, and again grasped Violet by the wrists, and said, in a low, resolute tone:

"I don't want to hurt you, Violet, but I am going to gag and bind you before we get out, unless you swear that you will make no sound to attract attention."

She realized that she was powerless in his hands and that it would be wise to yield entire submission to him for the present.

"There is no occasion for me to swear, but I will give you my word, which you know is as good as an oath," she returned, haughtily.

"All right," he answered, and at once let her go, for he knew that he could trust her.

He tapped upon the window of the carriage, and the man without immediately opened the door.

Wilhelm Mencke then got out, after which he assisted Violet to alight, and, without releasing his hold upon her, led her up the steps of a dark, deserted-looking house, which he entered with a latch-key.

He drew his captive into the hall, which was as dark as the catacombs of Egypt, shutting and double locking the door after them, and Violet's heart sank with a feeling of utter desolation as she heard the carriage in which they had come drive swiftly down the street.

Wilhelm Mencke then struck a match, and the young girl saw that they were in the long, narrow hall of an apparently unfurnished house. A flight of stairs, uncarpeted and unswept, led to the floor above, and thither her captor now drew her. She followed him without a word, but with a heart that grew heavier at every step.

Reaching the upper hall, Mr. Mencke paused before a door upon the right, and, after lighting another match, threw it open, revealing a comfortably, though rather scantily, furnished apartment.

A carpet, or an immense rug, somewhat faded and worn, had been spread upon the floor. A bed, ready for occupancy, stood in one corner, a table in another, while there were two or three chairs scattered about, and there was wood laid in an open grate, ready to light.

Mr. Mencke lighted a couple of candles, which stood on the mantle, after which he applied the match to the shavings in the grate; then turning to Violet, he remarked, with more of kindness in his tone than she had yet heard:

"This isn't much like your old room in the house on Auburn Avenue, Violet, but it must answer your purpose for the present."

"For the present," she repeated, as she faced him, haughtily, "what do you mean by that? How long am I to be kept in this miserable place, and what am I here for? I would like to know my fate."

"You need not be afraid of any harm or ill-usage, Violet, if you behave reasonably," Mr. Mencke said, in a reassuring tone. "I shall make you as comfortable and treat you as well as I can under the circumstances; you shall have plenty to eat, and all the reading matter you want, to make the time pass, but for the present you will have to stay right here, where no one can find you."

"For how long—days, weeks, or months?" she demanded.

"I can't say," he answered, shifting uneasily beneath her searching look, "at least, until I can mature my plans a little more fully. It may be some weeks—it may be months—I hope not, though, for my sake as well as yours."

He could not know the feeling of despair that settled upon the fair girl's heart at this reply.

It seemed terrible to her to have to be shut away from the light and air in that wretched house and narrow street in a strange portion of the city, and to be deprived of her freedom with no hope of being released for long weeks.

But she resolutely concealed her feelings, and began quietly to remove her hat and ulster.

"Very well," she said, coldly, "of course, being helpless, I am obliged to submit; but if I am to be kept a prisoner here for any length of time, I trust you will not force your society upon me any more than is absolutely necessary."

Wilhelm Mencke flushed angrily at her evident aversion.

"You had better keep a civil tongue in your head," he said, sharply, and then turned as if to leave the room.

"Look here, Wilhelm," Violet interposed, a note of anxiety in her tones, in spite of the brave front that she had assumed, "what kind of a place is this? Is the house empty?"

"Yes, the house is empty—at least no one else lives in it; so if you were building upon the hope of appealing to any one for help, you may as well be undeceived," he answered.

"Am I to stay here alone?" Violet demanded, a cold chill running through all her nerves at the thought.

"No, you are not to stay here alone," Mr. Mencke replied, his eye softening as he noticed her sudden pallor. "I have engaged a woman to stay here to get your meals and to wait upon you, and I shall sleep in the house at night, so you will not lack for protection."

"What do you want of me? What is your object in all this? I cannot understand it."

"That is my business; but I'll tell you this much—I may want you to sign some papers by and by," Mr. Mencke returned, thinking it well to pave the way a little for future schemes.

"Sign some papers?" she repeated, eagerly, but somewhat surprised. "If that is all, I will sign them this minute and——"

"They are not ready yet, and may not be for some time," he interposed; then he added, while an anxious look swept over his face: "I suppose you don't know anything about Belle's movements—I'd like to find her."

"No, I have no idea where she is, and you told me last summer that you had no wish to find her; what has happened to change your mind?" Violet inquired.

"Hum! a man sometimes says things in moments of anger that he doesn't exactly mean, and I'd give considerable to find Belle just now," he said, thoughtfully, and then added, as if he did not care to be questioned further, "but it is about time you had your supper. I will go and send it up," and he went out, locking the door after him.

Violet threw herself into a chair, exhausted from excitement and anxiety, and tried to think.

Had she followed her inclination she would have indulged in a flood of tears; but this she knew could do her no possible good and would unnerve and exhaust her still more, and she resolutely restrained herself.

It seemed the strangest thing in the world that Wilhelm Mencke should have abducted her in this way, and though he had intimated to her that he hoped to realize money from a possible reward offered for her, yet that did not seem a sufficient object to warrant so bold a crime, for he would incur a great risk in getting the money.

It was all a perplexing enigma to her.

"Well, so far as I can judge," she mused, with a heavy sigh, as she removed her glove, "my chief trial will consist in the exercise of patience and in living in this desolate place. I will try to bear it with as good a grace as possible," she added, bravely and resolutely, "but meanwhile I will keep my eyes, ears and wits on the alert and see if I cannot meet strategy with strategy. I wonder what the woman, who is to wait on me, is like. I wish she would bring my supper for I am getting hungry in spite of my uncomfortable situation. I would like to measure her, too, to see what I shall have to cope with in my future plans to get out of this place.

"In the first place," she went on, thoughtfully, "I mean to make friends with her—however true she may prove to be to Wilhelm's cause, it will be better to have her my friend than my enemy."

This was a wise resolution, and proved such during the weary weeks that followed, for it gained the young girl many an attention and dainty which she could not otherwise have had.

Presently Violet heard a door slam somewhere in the regions below, then there came the sound of steps upon the stairs, and a moment later the door was thrown open, when a woman of perhaps thirty years entered, bearing a tray, upon which there was neatly arranged a substantial and well-cooked meal.

She carefully relocked the door after her, simply nodding at her prisoner, while a curious smile flitted over her lips at Violet's pleasant "Good evening."

She was a large-framed, rather coarse-looking woman, having a ruddy complexion, heavy, jet-black hair, and piercing yet not unkindly eyes.

She placed her tray upon the table, which she rolled up to the fire, then setting a chair beside it, she said, respectfully:

"Your supper is ready, miss."

"Thank you," Violet returned, graciously, as she arose and went toward the table. "I believe I am very hungry, and"—as she ran her eye over the various viands—"you have brought me a very inviting looking repast. This steak is beautifully cooked, and your rolls look as if an artist had painted them, they are so evenly browned. Did you make them?"

"Yes," the woman briefly replied, while the curious smile again flickered over her face.

"She thinks I am 'giving her taffy', as the boys say," Violet thought, as she caught the smile; but she pretended not to notice it, and simply remarked, as she broke one of the delicious rolls in halves:

"They are light as a feather."

No reply was vouchsafed to this, and Violet continued to eat her supper in silence for several moments.

At length she asked:

"Are you the woman who is to look after me while I am here?"

"Yes."

That and nothing more, and Violet began to think she would find it a difficult matter to make friends with so taciturn a jailer.

But she looked up at her with a pleasant smile; it was as natural for the young girl to smile as it was to breathe.

"Then I shall have to call you something," she said. "What shall it be?"

"My name is Sarah," was the brief response.

"Well, then, I suppose you want me to call you Sarah, and I presume Mr. Mencke has told you who I am?"

Violet was anxious to learn how much the woman knew about her.

"Yes, you are Miss Draper," Sarah tersely replied.

"Ah, Wilhelm had not given her last name then! That was cunning in him," she thought.

She nodded assent to the name, however, and then asked:

"Won't you please tell me if you are to remain here over night, and where you are to sleep? I confess I feel somewhat lonely in this strange place."

"Yes, I'm to stay here, and I shall sleep in

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

SEVERAL months ago the sisters were invited to tell of the different ways in which they beautified their homes and made them more comfortable. Up to now the responses haven't been what one could truthfully call overwhelming, but this month, at a very opportune time, we have two splendid letters. The description of Mrs. Dallas' kitchen-porch leaves me wanting one just like it. Now what have the other sisters done? Tell us the little things for, after all, it is the little things that go to make up a day and a lifetime. —Ed.

ELMIRA, MO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have read COMFORT for years as my mother subscribed for it when I was a child. At that time it was, I think, ten cents a year, and since I have been in a home of my own it has always been a welcome visitor.

DAUGHTER OF MR. AND MRS. W. M. JAMES.

As most of the sisters describe themselves, I will do the same. Am five feet, four inches tall, weigh 140 pounds, have brown hair and blue eyes. Have been married nearly five years to one of the best Bills. We have a darling baby girl, one year old, and truly I feel I have had many things for which to be thankful. Life is just about what we make it and we can make it either a pleasure or a drudge. We all have our ups and downs and sometimes more downs than ups but just get a smile on your face and go ahead.

We live in a little town in the northwestern part of Missouri. The principal crops are corn, wheat and oats. I lived in Colorado one year and love the western country so much.

I would like to correspond with some of the COMFORT sisters and if they care to write to me I will try and answer all letters I receive.

I am sending a photograph of our baby which I hope to see in our corner.

Am enclosing ten cents for Uncle Charlie. Let's all send our dime within the next few months and go over the top with the Home Fund.

Best wishes to all. MRS. W. M. JAMES.

BRADFORD, ILL.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Your letters have brightened the days for me wonderfully and I feel as though I had been visiting all of you when I read the Sisters' Corner. It is helpful when we can get together like this, for one can doubly appreciate the privilege if they live in a new community among strangers that do not appear to care to make new friends. After having this experience I have vowed to make it a point to call on the newcomers and make them feel at home and one with us.

I am a very busy housewife, living on a farm. I try to keep down expenses by canning fruits, and using the cold pack method for the vegetables. I also raise chickens and geese to sell. The income from the butter and eggs has fed us and partly clothed us this year. I do all the sewing for my mother and little sister, and for myself as well. They are with us during vacation.

How many of the sisters have tried to raise pigs instead of chickens, to bring in extra pin money? My husband saw I was working too hard and tried to make it easier for me. He gave me a sow with four little pigs, which later I sold for over $300.00. Then I bought a thoroughbred Hampshire sow. She raised sixteen pigs last year. A person could buy a sow with chicken money or raise up a little pig to get a start. It does not cost any more to feed them than it does to feed chickens and they are not as much care. But to figure them on a paying basis, after paying hubby for his share of the feed there will still be a big profit left. This plan has worked out so well that this year I will not raise any poultry to sell, and I will have that extra time for my housework, as my William thinks the most profitable place for his wife is to be queen over the house, keeping everything polished up, and for her to be sweet and refreshed when she meets him at the door.

The income from the pigs I keep in the "Savings Fund" to be used for improving the house, remodeling, painting and replacing of furniture, etc., as I see fit. Aside from this we share equally. And we both have free access to the purse and check book. I appreciate his liberality and try not to be wasteful.

In response to "What the sisters have done to make the home attractive," I will tell you how I managed to get a sink into my narrow seven-foot kitchen. An opening was cut out of the wall, the width of a sink and higher than my head. The sink was set in even with the wall and boxed in all around the back and two sides. This extends back onto the porch and looks like a cupboard from that side. In the kitchen side it has a door below the sink and I hang my dishpan on this door. Part way above the sink there is a narrow shelf where I put the dishes as I wipe them. A 30x36-inch sink is large enough to hold a dishpan and draining rack.

As my kitchen is very small, it gets real hot in summer so we built a summer porch on the east end. It is 12x16 feet. The sides are boarded up three feet

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

THE one-dish meal is a boon to the housewife at any time and particularly so during the days when there is spring cleaning on "upstairs, downstairs and in m'lady's chamber," and it doesn't make any difference whether it is cooked in a casserole of glass or earthenware with shiny nickel trimmings or the odd baking dish that every kitchen possesses, with a cover borrowed from the agate saucepan; the taste is the same. A few casserole dishes are given below.—Ed.

ESCALLOPED OYSTERS.—One quart of oysters, one pint of milk, one half cup butter, two eggs, salt and pepper to taste and two dozen crackers, rolled fine. Butter an ordinary baking dish, with cover. Heat milk, add cracker-crumbs, melted butter, oysters, beaten eggs and seasoning; stir well, cover with layer of cracker-crumbs and bake half an hour. When nearly done, remove cover to let crumbs brown.

SALT FISH AND PARSNIPS.—Soak boneless salt fish half a day, and very slowly bring to a boil but do not let it boil. Try out salt pork in frying pan, then add raw parsnips cut in slices, and after they have heated through and been turned in the fat, add a cup of boiling water. Cover tight for fifteen minutes, and then remove cover and brown. Arrange on platter in alternate rows with salt pork, and over all pour a white sauce.

BAKED CRACKERS AND CHEESE.—Twelve crackers, one cup of grated cheese, one and one half cups of milk, salt and pepper to taste, and two tablespoons of flour. Make a sauce of the milk, flour, cheese and salt. Break the crackers into halves, moisten slightly with milk, and arrange in layer on bottom of baking dish. Cover with cheese sauce, then another layer of crackers and repeat until all are used. Let cook twenty minutes. —MRS. D. E. M., Sulphur Springs.

ESCALLOPED EGGS.—Six hard-boiled eggs, one pint cream, three quarters cup cold chopped meat, one quarter cup chopped walnuts, and one cup of cracker-crumbs. Cover bottom of baking dish with layer of crumbs, cover with layer of eggs, moistened with cream, another layer of eggs followed by meat and nuts mixed together. Repeat until ingredients are used, having top layer of crumbs, dotted with pieces of butter. Add rest of cream and put in oven to bake.—M. E. H., Milton, Mass.

CASSEROLE OF RICE AND MEAT.—Line a mould (slightly greased) with steamed rice. Fill the center with two cups cold, finely chopped, cooked meat, seasoned with salt, pepper, cayenne, celery salt and onion juice. Then add one fourth cup cracker-crumbs, one egg slightly beaten and enough hot stock or water to moisten. Cover meat with rice; cover rice with buttered paper to keep out moisture while steaming and steam 45 minutes. Serve with tomato sauce.

RICE CROQUETTES WITH VEGETABLES.—Pour half a cup of boiling water over half a cup of well washed rice. Add half a teaspoon of salt, cover, and steam on back of stove until the rice has absorbed the water. Add one cup of scalding milk and stir lightly with a fork, then cover and steam until rice is tender. Pour into a cool dish and add two well-beaten egg yolks and three teaspoons of butter, and when cool enough to handle, shape into flat balls, hollowing out the top. Roll in beaten egg, then in fine bread-crumbs, and fry in deep fat. Fill the center with peas or other vegetable, and surround with quarters of boiled beets.

CORN SOUP.—Three quarters can of corn, one quart of milk, one teaspoon of salt, one half teaspoon pepper, one teaspoon sugar, one teaspoon flour, and one tablespoon butter. Put the milk in double boiler to heat. Cook the salt, pepper, sugar, flour and butter together until the flour is well cooked; add to it a little of the hot milk, mix well and pour into the milk. Heat the corn and, when ready to serve, pour it into the thickened milk.

MOCK BISQUE SOUP.—Two thirds quart can tomatoes, one quart of boiling milk, and two thirds teaspoon soda. Cook the tomatoes, remove from stove and strain through a sieve, add the soda and while it is foaming add the hot milk. Season with salt, pepper and add a little butter.

ORANGE SNOW.—Soak one quarter of a box of gelatine in one quarter of a cup of cold water until soft. In three quarters of a cup of boiling water grate half the yellow from one orange rind and strain after standing five minutes. Add the soaked gelatine and one cup of sugar and stir until it dissolves, and then add one half cup of strained orange juice. When it begins to stiffen, beat in the whites of three eggs that have previously been beaten to a stiff froth. With an egg beater continue beating until thick enough to prevent settling and pour into mould. To serve, turn out onto serving plate, surround with sections of orange from which the seeds and pulp have been carefully removed and edge the plate with macaroons.

MOCK DUCK.—Take four pounds of round steak; have it cut in two slices about an inch thick; sprinkle with salt and cover with dressing made as for turkey. Roll and tie firmly, sew in cloth and steam four hours.

PEA SOUP.—One cup of split peas soaked over night in cold water, two teaspoons butter, one tablespoon flour, one half teaspoon each salt, pepper and sugar, and two quarts of cold water. Put the peas over the fire in two quarts of cold water and let come slowly to a boil; simmer until the peas are thoroughly cooked. As the liquid boils away add more water to keep it to two quarts. When the peas are cooked soft, rub through a colander and return to fire. If too thick, dilute with milk, bring to a boil and stir in the butter and flour, rub together until smooth, and season.

When Wide Awake

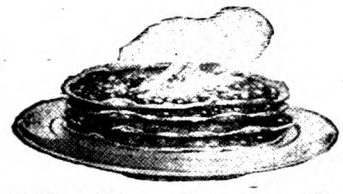
In the morning Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs. Serve with cream and sugar, with melted butter or mixed with any fruit.

They are food confections—bubble grains—with a taste like toasted nuts. No cereal foods were ever so delicious.

Serve them often—not on gala mornings only. They are not mere tidbits—they are scientific foods.

When children love these Puffed Grains as they do, let them revel in them.

Girls also like to use them as nut meats in their candies and as garnish on ice cream.



When Sleepy

At night serve Puffed Wheat in a bowl of milk. These are whole-wheat bubbles, flimsy, flaky, puffed to eight times normal size.

Every food cell is exploded by Prof. Anderson's process, so digestion is easy and complete.

This is the perfect good-night dish. It supplies whole-wheat nutrition. It does not tax the stomach. With milk it makes the greatest dish that you can serve to children.

In addition to all this, Puffed Grains are also the most fascinating cereal foods known.

Like Pancakes made with nuts

Now we are making a pancake flour mixed with ground Puffed Rice. The Puffed Rice Flour makes the pancakes fluffy and it gives a nutty taste. Never were pancakes so delicious as you can make with puffed Rice Pancake Flour. Try it. The flour is self-raising.

Driven Apart

by Julia Edwards

At that instant Neil's eyes noticed an object on the rug.

But his glad cry faded on his lips. The room was empty.

"Tell me this, my poor girl. Were you married to Mr. Preston?"

"I ask nothing of heaven," she said harshly.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nicholas Berdyne, past middle age, his face marred by dissipation, schemes with Hartley Trenwyck to win Beryl Grayson, whose father is dead. She is engaged to Neil Preston, who goes to Alaska in the interest of a mine owned by Grayson and which falls into Berdyne's hands. Neil Preston is reported dead by Dave Gorsline, who is hired by Berdyne to tell Beryl. In her sorrow and loss of wealth, she refuses continued aid from Berdyne. Mr. Jackman from Denver, wanting to repay a debt owed to Beryl's father, invites Beryl to his ranch, where she forms a friendship for Tonita, a beautiful Mexican girl, who advises her not to marry Berdyne through any mistaken idea of gratitude. Irma Lee, discarded by Berdyne, warns Beryl that he serves his own selfish purpose and that Neil Preston lives and is on his way to Jackman's Ranch. Berdyne, persistent that Beryl shall become his wife, Neil Preston, overhearing her denunciation of his baseness and treachery and refusing to marry him, confronts Berdyne who swears he will follow his trail. The day Beryl Grayson becomes Berdyne's wife, Morley Preston, opposed to Neil's marriage, will tender Trenwyck a check for five thousand dollars and Berdyne will give a like sum. He admits Beryl's trust in Jackson and that the letter written offering her the home was inspired by him, that he holds a heavy mortgage on the Jackman ranch, and with this knowledge they plot to separate the lovers who plan to be married the following day. Jackman, a tool in Berdyne's and Trenwyck's hands, drugs the wine which he gives Beryl when he drinks with her to her happiness, and she, feeling dizzy and faint, goes to her room and the door is locked. Neil Preston, returning for Beryl, meets Tonita. Approaching Jackman's house, an automobile is in waiting and a man with Beryl in his arms appears from the house and lifts her into the car. Preston strikes him down, and taking the auto, with Tonita, they make their escape through the night for San Francisco. Trenwyck advises Berdyne not to go too far. Not to be foiled in capturing Beryl, they take an early train to San Francisco, wiring Gorsline to watch for the auto, the Red Flyer, which he locates near the residence of a minister, who is called early to perform a marriage ceremony, which is scarcely over, when there is a summons from the door. Berdyne enters, and Neil, struggling to defend his wife, reels and falls to the floor mid the chaos of an earthquake, while Beryl is borne helplessly away. Making her escape, she wanders back to Pine Street, searching the wrecked house in vain for her husband, who is hurried to a temporary hospital by Tonita. She leaves a note for Neil that Berdyne has taken Beryl in the Red Flyer. Neil, regaining consciousness, goes in search of his wife, and seeing the wreck of the machine, knows that Beryl has escaped from Berdyne. Trenwyck, in league with Gorsline, meeting Beryl, assures her that Tonita is waiting for her on Sutter Street, and, unconscious of treachery, she goes with Trenwyck, where she is made a prisoner by Gorsline. Neil, wandering on Portsmouth Square, recognizes Trenwyck and following him sees him enter the house to which Beryl is persuaded to go. He opens the front door and lets himself in.

CHAPTER XVIII.

IN THE DRAWING-ROOM.

ONCE within the house, Neil could hear voices talking in one of the rooms that opened off the hall. There were two men, but neither had the voice of Berdyne; of that Neil was sure.

Closing the door as softly as he had opened it, he stood for a space under the broken transom. As he lingered, trying to decide what he had better do, a fluttering firebrand was blown in at the gap above the spacious doors. He smothered it under his foot, advanced a few steps, and then halted and looked up through the opening.

Scraps of fire were falling thickly outside, startling proof that the conflagration was coming close to that part of Sutter Street. The thunder of dynamite explosions, too, was drawing nearer. Yet still the two men in the room off the hall continued to talk.

Neil stole a look between the damask curtains of the first arched doorway. The men were not in that apartment, but their voices came through another draped archway leading to the drawing-room. He stepped into the first room and crossed it, his footsteps muffled by the thick carpet on which he trod. Halting at the other curtains, he drew one a little apart, and peered through.

Trenwyck was there, and a low-browed, bull-necked scoundrel whose sodden face bore an indelible mark of the gallows. Who could that second man be? Neil waited and listened, thinking he might secure a clew from the conversation of the precious pair.

The men were sprawled in easy-chairs. A box of cigars and a decanter of wine and glasses were on a gilded table between them. Trenwyck was just lighting a cigar, but Gorsline was already smoking.

Neil's clue was not long in coming.

"You may be a lawyer, right enough," grunted the bull-necked ruffian, "but you're a fool, for all that. It wasn't no time to fill up on wine. The way you acted, no wonder the gal was scart an' tumbled to our game."

"She was bound to find it out sooner or later, Gorsline," replied Trenwyck, in a half-apologetic tone. "What did you do with her?"

"Tied her in a chair. Didn't think I was goin' to let her go, did you?"

Gorsline! The mere sound of the ruffian's name on Trenwyck's lips, fired Neil's blood. Here, then, was the man Berdyne had hired to go to Beryl with a vicious falsehood—a plausible lie that had brought Beryl near to death, and caused her months of torture.

Neil's breath came short and hard, and his dark eyes gleamed with the righteous wrath that filled him. Only the importance of his hearing more of what the two villains were saying prevented him from springing out and taking terrible vengeance then and there.

This was the first time Neil had ever set eyes on Gorsline. The ruffian knew him by sight, for Berdyne had set him to dogging Neil the very day the Argonaut had reached her home port.

Grinding his teeth and smothering his impatience, Neil waited and listened. The two had already mentioned a woman whom the gunman had made a prisoner. Neil's heart sickened at the thought that it might be Beryl. But, whether it was Beryl or not, he would free the captive at all costs.

"Well, no," muttered the lawyer, after a brief silence, "I didn't think you would let her go, Gorsline; but, if we can't find Nick, what are we to do with her?"

"Durned if I know. If you could drug her, we might take her across the bay to that yacht Berdyne has chartered, or mebby to the houseboat in Belvedere Cove."

"I've had enough of this drugging business," said Trenwyck; "and as for getting her through the city at a time like this, it's not to be thought of. But say," he added, "she's a little beauty, ain't she? I've seen a good many beautiful women, but never one to compare with her."

"Stow it!" snapped Gorsline. "You ought to have more sense than to talk like that, or do what you done. Ain't thinkin' o' cuttin' Berdyne out, are you?" he added, with a sharp look.

Trenwyck gave a forced laugh. The effects of the wine were wearing off slowly, and he was becoming more discreet.

"Nonsense!" he exclaimed. "I can admire Berdyne's taste if I want to, can't I?"

"I give you warnin', my buck, that that's as far as you'd better go with it. You didn't get any track o' Berdyne while you was out lookin'?"

"The town is too big, and in too much of a turmoil, to find any one. I'm wondering how you and I ever came together, and how chance ever enabled me to find Beryl Grayson as I did."

"There's something I can't understand," observed Gorsline. "You say she said she used to be Miss Beryl Grayson. Do you think she and Preston was married at that sky pilot's house, this mornin'?"

But Neil had heard more than enough. He had satisfied himself that his darling was really in the hands of those wretches. Without giving Trenwyck time to answer Gorsline's question, he dashed through the curtains.

"Preston!" cried Trenwyck, springing erect.

"By the eternal, if it ain't!" added Gorsline, likewise leaping to his feet. At the same time the ruffian's hand groped at the front of his shirt.

Beryl's wrongs, no less than Neil's own, were crying aloud for vengeance. It was the awful purpose shining in Neil's face that prompted Gorsline to think of a weapon and reach for it.

The air in the house had become well-nigh stifling. A whiff of smoke and a low crackling as of flames followed Neil from the front apartment into the drawing-room. A sound of hurried movements reached them from without. Yet these various sights and sounds of peril claimed not the least attention from the three men who stood facing each other—two of them glaring into each other's eyes their hate and defiance.

"You have been talking," said Neil, his voice low, but filled with a deadly menace, "of my wife. Her fair name is not to be sullied by lips like yours. I have heard much that has been spoken between you, and I am confident that, by the exercise of your devilish arts, you have spirited her away and made her a prisoner. You will tell me where she is, without a moment's loss of time, or both of you shall die!"

His voice rang out in the room with the last words, and Trenwyck cowered. He was a craven, at best, but Gorsline was made of sterner stuff.

"You'll find out nothin' from me, d'you hear?" he shouted. "When you talk about takin' a man's life, that's a game two can play at."

As he finished speaking, Gorsline drew a knife from the breast of his shirt; a long, keen blade that glittered ominously as he gripped the handle and held it ready.

"Not that, Gorsline!" cried the frantic Trenwyck. "Preston," he added, imploringly, "have a care what you do!"

"Curse you for a coward!" exclaimed Gorsline, speaking to Trenwyck, but keeping his baleful eyes on Neil with catlike vigilance. "If you try to interfere with me, I'll knife you as well."

Neil was unarmed, yet the sight of the knife in no wise dismayed him. He felt that he could take the coarse ruffian by the throat with his two hands and strangle him like a cur. Beryl, his darling wife—her liberty, perhaps her life, was at stake.

The lawyer was in fearful straits. If any harm befell this scion of the proud family of Prestons, through him, there would be a woeful accounting.

"This—this must stop right here!" went on the lawyer, thoroughly sobered now. He even plucked up courage enough to take a step toward the two who stood facing each other, ready for a spring and a life-and-death struggle.

"Keep back!" roared Gorsline savagely. "The man that comes off best won't suffer for what happens here. Whatever deed is done will be wiped out by the fire in less'n an hour."

As if to exemplify these gruesome words, the clatter of a galloping horse was heard in the street, together with the stentorian cry:

"Clear the street! We're about to dynamite! Clear the street!"

The warning passed unheeded over the heads of Neil and Gorsline. They merely nerved themselves for the final struggle, realizing the necessity of having it quickly over with.

Neil's sharp eyes had been measuring the situation. When he moved, it was with a lightning-like quickness that caught his enemy unprepared. A chair stood near. Neil caught it up, and hurled it straight at Gorsline.

The ruffian sprang back, but not swiftly enough to evade a staggering blow in the side. He still held to his knife, but, before he could recover from the effects of the blow, Neil sprang upon him. One hand went to Gorsline's throat, and the other to the hand that held the knife. Clinging to each other fiercely, the two men reeled and swayed.

Trenwyck, craven though he was, and eager to preserve his life from dynamite and fire, was yet held to the scene by a horrid fascination. He could not go, although he knew he was in deadly peril every moment he stayed.

"Don't you hear?" he demanded feebly. "They're going to use dynamite in this block, perhaps in this very building!"

If he could have done so, Trenwyck would have crossed to the door leading into the library and released Beryl. But the door was secured, and the key was in Gorsline's possession. To go out by the front door, pass around to the side of the house, and enter the library by one of the windows, would have been feasible, but in that dread moment the idea never occurred to the lawyer.

For a full minute the combatants stood struggling back and forth, Gorsline powerless to free himself and slowly choking; then the ruffian, with a despairing call upon every particle of his strength, pushed forward, and forced his lighter antagonist back.

An overturned chair was behind Neil. He did not see it, and he could not have guarded himself against it if he had seen it. He fell at full length, and Gorsline, shaking the strangling clutch from his throat, dropped down upon him with a horrid shout of triumph.

"Now it is my turn!" he cried, his purplish face writhing with insane fury.

The knife was raised; and it would have fallen but for Trenwyck. With all his strength the lawyer caught the ruffian's lifted arm, and, amid oaths and curses from the latter, twisted the dagger from his grasp.

Neil was only momentarily at a disadvantage. His hands flew up, twisted themselves about the scoundrel's throat, and, with an irresistible movement of his body, he overturned his antagonist and held him to the floor.

"Tell me all, or you shall die!" he cried fiercely.

At that instant Neil's eyes noticed an object on the rug. Some of Gorsline's ghoulish spoils had been shaken from his coat, and among the articles was a ring—the ring Neil had given Beryl!

"Oh, you fiend! You inhuman wretch!" shouted Neil, in a spasm of wild rage. "If any harm has befallen my wife through you, I'll——"

Gorsline attempted to speak. Neil relaxed his fearful grip to permit intelligible words to come.

"She is safe—I swear it!" gasped Gorsline chokingly.

"Where is my darling? Tell me, or, by Heaven, you shall never live to leave this house!"

"The library—the door on the left," said Gorsline thickly.

"The door is locked; he has the key," put in Trenwyck.

Neil saw a key on the rug at Gorsline's side. Picking up both the key and the ring, he sprang from the ruffian and rushed to the door. Another instant and he had turned the key in the lock, opened the door wide, and leaped into the library.

"Beryl, my wife! My darling!"

But his glad cry faded on his lips. The room was empty—there was no one there! The awful disappointment almost unhinged his reason. He tottered back against the wall, breathless from his late struggle no less than because of his conflicting emotions.

"Beryl, Beryl!" he continued to cry, but his staring eyes saw only vacancy.

Thinking he had been tricked, he turned back into the other room. But Gorsline and Trenwyck were gone. Blast after blast of exploding dynamite shook the house, yet Neil had no thought of leaving until he had learned more.

He ran back into the library. The smoke was thickening in the other rooms, but the library as yet was fairly clear.

A chair caught his eye; about it lay the makeshift ropes which Gorsline had used in binding his unhappy prisoner. Neil examined them.

Yes, he persuaded himself, it must be! Beryl had freed herself. But how had she escaped from the room?

His glaring eyes, smarting with the smoke, passed around the walls, and finally reached the openings where the windows had been. He rushed to the broken gaps in the outer wall and looked out and down.

There was little doubt in his mind then. Beryl had freed herself of the twisted cords, and escaped from the house by one of the windows.

By this time the air was like that of a furnace. Without pausing a second longer, he hurled himself out. A mighty detonation accompanied by a lurid glare followed his flight; and with one arm thrown across his face to protect it from flying debris, he plunged on into the chaos of the street.

CHAPTER XIX.

A FRIEND IN NEED.

Beryl had been but a child in the cruel grasp of Gorsline. He had hurled her into the leather chair, bound her securely with the twisted sheets, and then smothered her lips with a fold of cloth. He feared she would cry out, and that some of the refugees who were fleeing along Sutter Street would come to her aid. This grievous work, finished, he tore the magnificent diamond from Beryl's finger and went back to the other room. Trenwyck had already left to search for Berdyne.

Poor Beryl could not plead with the wretched thief to spare her the ring; she could not tell him how the golden circlet symbolized the tie that bound her to the man she loved better than life; nevertheless, her eyes expressed the mute agony she felt, and the sad, despairing tears dropped from her long lashes.

She had been deceived by these hirelings of Berdyne. Tonita was not there; the promise of meeting her had been a trick to lure her into that deserted house. And that "good news" which was to tell of Neil's safety, and of the place where he was impatiently awaiting his beloved—ah, this, this was as false as all the rest! How was it that, in the great world, there could be hearts so base!

And the faithless one who had led her into that trap had gone in quest of Nicholas Berdyne! He would come there; again she would find herself in his ruthless hands.

The very thought roused her tortured soul to action. She tried to scream, to wrench herself free so that she might fly with winged feet from the hateful spot; but her struggles were in vain, and she gave up with a choking sigh. Then, in that supreme moment, when she thought the fight was lost, a voice came to her.

"Tell me this, my poor girl: Were you married to Mr. Preston?"

It was a woman's voice. For an instant the stricken girl felt that she must be dreaming. She looked up and saw Irma Lee standing before her. How could it be that Irma Lee was there, in that room, when she and Beryl had last met in the wooded path at Sunset Ranch?

"Ah, how brutally you have been treated!" exclaimed Irma Lee, seeming to notice for the first time the cloth that covered Beryl's lips and prevented speech.

Without loss of a moment, she unfastened the cloth and removed it, and then deftly untied the knots of the makeshift ropes.

"You here!" exclaimed Beryl wonderingly.

"Not so loud, Miss Grayson," warned Irma, in a whisper. "Remember, Gorsline is in the other room. The door is closed and locked, and so we may talk for a little time."

"But how did you come?" persisted Beryl.

The other pointed to one of the window openings. "It was comparatively easy to enter this room in that way," she said.

"You knew these men were here?" continued Beryl.

Making a House a Home

By Eveline Vance

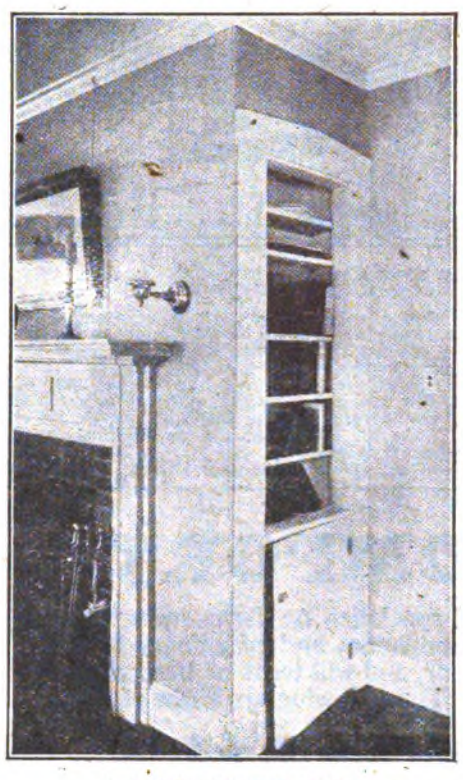
IT is often from seeing what others have done that we acquire the ambition to do the very same things for ourselves. Most likely, they are things that please the eye, suggest peace and comfort, and a saving of money; especially the latter, for thrifty we must be if we are keeping apace with the "new thought" of readjustment. In earlier days, our foremothers looked upon the papering of several rooms, the weaving of her own homespun and carpets as quite within her range of capabilities, and when we consider the money value attached to old pieces of hand-made furniture, whether handsome or merely "interesting", we realize we are going back to old-time ways, but with modern ingenuity and progression that leads to greater accomplishments.



The demands on the housemother who would make everyone within her home comfortable and happy are very great, and instinctively she knows that success comes by making the most of her limitations. Riches alone never made a home. It will build a house, but there must be the leading spirit of the home-maker, who with the simplest materials will create an interior that will not lack in charm and individuality. Such a home-maker will never depart from the appearance of domesticity, and she will always keep in mind that the chief purpose of a room is to provide comfortable accommodations for those who wish to read, study, talk, sleep, eat, or to enjoy various forms of amusement.

Someone has said that there should be a family resemblance in the furnishings of a room—a statement which carries a volume of truth. A room may acquire a restless appearance from inharmonious colors, too much bric-a-brac, and furniture that in this particular room could never become intimate, but if separated and distributed to various parts of the house would at once find companionship.

In the accompanying illustrations we observe that the keynote to repose and dignity is correct arrangement, usefulness, and an utter lack of extravagance. On still closer scrutiny it will be found that with few exceptions, all these furnishings may be worked out at only the cost of material. It only requires a little practical working knowledge, combined with incentive and patience.

Built-in Bookcases

From a purely artistic viewpoint, the two living-rooms demonstrate how much the presence of books does toward furnishing and decorating. They have no equals, besides the wealth of friendship they offer. The built-in bookcase, finished the same as the woodwork of the room, has prac-

Cubby Bear Plays "Follow My Fancy"

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett Pub., Inc.

"GOOD BY, Mamma Bruin," called Cubby Bear gaily, putting his head in at the door; "do not expect me home until night. We have a beautiful new game to play. Robbie Reddie has been telling us about it. It is 'Follow My Fancy,' and each player starts off in whatever direction he pleases, and does whatever he likes for the whole day; then at night they meet, and each tells the others what he has done. It will be great fun. Robbie Reddie, Shinyblack Crow, Dr. Squilly Porcupine, Wollie Woodchuck and I are to be the players."

Cubby ran out to where the others were waiting for him.

"One, two, three—and away!" cried Robbie Reddie, and they all started off.

Cubby Bear, after thinking a moment, went towards a hemlock thicket which he had long intended to explore. The lower branches of the hemlocks grew close to the ground, and it was hard work going through the thicket. Cubby struggled bravely, and succeeded in crawling and squirming his way through, although he got several scratches, and left a bit of his fur hanging here and there on the boughs. He sat down to rest for a little.

"I am glad he did it!" he exulted. "I do not like to give up when once I have started out to do a thing!"

The way was now easier, and he trotted briskly along, with courage high, ready for whatever adventures he might chance to meet.

"How dark it is growing!" he thought. "Night cannot be coming now—I know it did not take me all day to go through the hemlocks."

Soon the darkness lifted, and woods and sky took on a pinkish glow, as Cubby had seen it sometimes at the sunset hour, but brighter. The trees around him now were tall and straight, all graceful white birches. The ground beneath his paws was smooth and level, except that it sloped gently downward before him, and as he went along he stooped to pick flowers of such beauty and fragrance as he had never seen before.

At the foot of the slope he came to a shallow pond, a beautiful little sheet of water, which reflected the white birches on its banks, and little clouds that floated in the sky. On one foot, in the middle of the pond, stood a great bird, a crane, with grayish blue feathers, long of leg and neck. Cubby thought at first he had but the one leg, but later learned that he had two.

The crane unfolded one wing and waved it at Cubby Bear.

"You've come at last!" he called. "You were long enough about it!"

"Were—were you expecting me?" asked Cubby, in surprise.

"To be sure!" answered the bird. "Why else have we turned on all the pink lights, and swept and dusted the pond so carefully?"

"We——?" asked Cubby. "Are there others like you?"

"To be sure!" said the crane again. "Connie Crane, and Callow Crane, and Capery Crane, and Contrary Crane, and Clowny Crane, and Comical Crane, and Cabbie Crane, and Cackling Crane, and Calamity Crane, and Calendar Crane—and as many more as you like. I am Commodore Crane. Allow me to introduce myself. You may be Company Crane for today, if you like."

"Thank you, but I think I would rather be Cubby Bear," said Cubby hastily.

"Oh, just as you like—I shall take no offense—but how anyone can prefer to be a bear when he might just as well be a crane, is—well, it's unbelievable!"

Commodore Crane uncurled his hidden leg, and putting one claw in his bill, blew a long, loud whistle, so shrill that Cubby covered his ears.

"Did I deafen you?" asked the crane politely.

"I don't think so," answered Cubby. "At least, I heard your question."

"I'm glad of that," said the bird. "And yet, I don't know—it would be rather nice not to be able to hear when one was scolded, or told to do unpleasant things. What do you say—I can whistle much louder—would you like to try a little deafness, just in one ear, for instance?" And again he put a claw in his bill.

"Oh, no! No, thank you!" cried Cubby.

"As you like," said the Commodore. "I always try to please. Ah, here they come! I was calling the rest of the family. We are all brothers and sisters."

Across the pond, a strange crowd came into view, long-legged cranes, so like one another that Cubby knew he could never tell them apart. In and out among the birches they twisted in fantastic procession mincing along on tiptoe, swaying their heads from side to side, raising and lowering their great wings.

"That's our famous Trippy-Toe March," explained the Commodore, as the cranes ranged themselves side by side at the edge of the pond. "Next, you shall see the Splish-Splash Drill. Attention—get your branches."

Each crane stretched up his long neck (Cubby thought some of them would never be the proper length again) and plucked a leafy branch from a white birch tree.

Then they sprang into the water, going through the strangest antics, and splashing the water all about with their branches, while the Commodore shouted directions.

"Now you must entertain us!" said Cabbie Crane. "Let us see how long you can stand in the water, on your head."

"Oh, no! I should drown if I did that," demurred Cubby.

"Naughty, naughty!" cried Comical Crane, shaking a claw at him playfully. "I'll have to call a little cloud down, to hide you!"

CUBBY STARED, OPEN-MOUTHED WITH ASTONISHMENT.

"Right—left—forward—backward—large circles—small circles—somersaults—wave wings. Ah, well done! well done! Now form in a reception circle, and the guest of the day, Mr. Cubby Bear, shall be introduced to you."

Then the Commodore offered his wing to Cubby, who took it rather awkwardly, not being used to such ceremony, and led him out into the water, where the other cranes stood ready to receive him.

Cubby looked up, and there, sure enough, was a little pinkish cloud coming down to the pond. It covered Cubby with a pink mistiness which hid everything from his sight.

"That's enough," said the Commodore, after a few moments, during which Comical Crane giggled gleefully; "you shouldn't tease a visitor."

Then the cloud sailed away up into the sky, where it belonged.

"We'll show him a few tricks," said Clowny Crane, "since he won't do any for us."

"Not I!" declined Contrary Crane. "I was told I could have a holiday, and I'm off for a journey."

"Something unpleasant'll happen, sure as you go," warned Calamity Crane. "You mark my words."

"Oh, let him go!" interrupted Calendar Crane. "We'll keep today—he can't take that away from us—but he may take all next week with him if he likes. That would leave, let me see! that would leave twenty-two more days in the month, and that is quite long enough to suit me."

"All ready for the tower trick!" said Capery Crane. "Position, Cabbie!"

Cabbie Crane waded to the center of the pond, then stood up very straight, wings spread, feet firmly braced.

Connie Crane sprang upward, landing on Cabbie's back, and stood there, with wings outspread, also. Then Capery Crane flew up and stood upon Connie's back, and one after another all the cranes followed, until they formed a high tower, all standing motionless, with wings wide-spread.

Cubby Bear stared, open-mouthed with astonishment. However could they balance themselves so perfectly?

Then the living tower bent toward him, and in a moment more, the cranes were all about him, and he put up his paws to shield his face from the flapping wings and waving claws.

The wings stirred the air like a rushing wind. The pink glow faded away like the sunset colors at twilight.

"Push him!"

"Hurry him!"

"Shove him!"

"Batter him!"

"Today's gone! Contrary Crane's week is beginning, he'll take the time away with him, and we can't have bears around! Get him away, quick!"

Poor Cubby, buffetted by strong wings and clutching claws, was hustled along, back up the flower-strewn slope of land, and into the hemlock thicket. After struggling once more through the close-growing branches, he hurried home, where he found Robbie Reddie and the others waiting for him.

"Now," said Robbie, "we will hear how each one 'Followed His Fancy.' You begin, Wollie."

Wollie Woodchuck grinned sheepishly.

"Why, I——I went back home, and went to sleep, and did not waken until sunset," he said.

"Shinyblack Crow next."

"I spent the day as I have many another," said Shinyblack Crow. "I often 'Follow My Fancy.' I flew up far above the trees, then sailed away, and away, and away, over cities, and rivers, and forests. When the sun was straight overhead, I landed, had some dinner, and then flew back home again. It is grand exercise, up in the pure, sweet air and oh, such scenery! There is nothing to compare with it for those whose feet must be always on the ground. Now, Squilly, it is your turn."

"I had a good time," said Dr. Squilly Porcupine, "but I was working hard, too. My fancy led me toward the west, the direction the sun would take, but I had not gone far before I found a wounded partridge, moaning in great distress. He had broken a leg, a wing, and a rib. I spent most of the day setting the broken bones and putting on splints and bandages. After that, I found something for him to eat, and looked up one of his friends who promised to take care of him."

"A good day's work," said Robbie Reddie. "As for myself, I flew away to where a broad river flows smoothly on its way to the sea. Leaning out over the water was a great willow tree. I lighted on one of its swaying branches and sat there, singing and swinging, and watching the river, which reflected the trees and clouds. Oh, I was so happy there, I was sorry when the day was ended."

Then they looked at Cubby Bear, waiting for him to begin.

"I have had a strange, strange day!" he sighed. "I am afraid you will not believe me, but I will tell you as best I can."

They all listened with wondering faces.

When he ended his story, he leaned his head wearily on his paws.

"We were to tell the truth, you know," said Wollie.

Cubby was silent.

"You went through the hemlocks, and went straight on?" asked Shinyblack Crow.

"Yes."

"But there is no pond in that direction," said Shinyblack Crow. "I have flown over all this region enough to be sure of that. There is a large pond south of here. I will show you the way there some day; but there are no white birches near, and the water is deep."

Dr. Squilly rose and laid his paw on Cubby Bear's head.

"I am afraid he has a fever," he said to the others.

"More likely he went to sleep and dreamed it all," said Robbie Reddie. "What do you think about it, Cubby?"

"I do not know," answered Cubby sorrowfully.

Literature is the tongue of the world.
The devil has had martyrs among men.
Too much forethought can make us unhappy.
A good library is a friend of a thousand years.

True liberty is not liberty to do evil as well as good.
Many moments have passed, but few think of them.
Every face has lines and boundaries and is a map of life.
A little thing comforts us because a little thing afflicts us.
Nature has established laws, and it is our part to obey them.

LEAGUE RULES: To be a comfort to one's parents. To protect the weak and aged. To be kind to dumb animals. To love our country and protect its flag.

CONDUCTED BY UNCLE CHARLIE

COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 55 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome.

ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

HOP up onto my lap and let's have a real old-time chat. This is, if I am not mistaken, the seventeenth anniversary of the founding of COMFORT's League of Cousins. We ought, at least, to have a hundred thousand members in our ranks by now, whereas we have but half that number. As a matter of fact, there is no reason why we should not have a million, for who is there who would not go on record as wanting to be a "comfort to his parents, to protect the weak and aged, to be kind to dumb animals;" and who but a crack-brained pacifist or a Bolshevist revolutionist would not be ready to join any league that stood for protection of his country, home and dear ones and a flag that symbolizes all worth-while human ideals.

We have recently printed a list containing hundreds of names of those of our League members who wish to correspond with one another. You should join the League for the principles it upholds; for the good it does, and if you want to make some sincere pen friend (as thousands have already done), that list will be sent you when you join the League.

I want to thank all those who did their best to make my Christmas a happy one, especially Mrs. Murrock of Barnes Corners, N. Y., who sent me a princely gift—four dozen new-laid eggs!!! As we have been paying a dollar twenty per dozen for eggs that had all the odor of a glue factory and which were laid thousands of years before Noah became the secretary Daniels of the world's first navy, and Eve had got wise to present-day lady's apparel by wearing a fig leaf, those eggs were a godsend. As soon as the news got wind that there were four dozen new-laid eggs in this house, I had to phone to police headquarters for a platoon of Irish cops to guard my treasure. I was almost in as tough a predicament as those who are hoarding whiskey. Burglars don't care about dollars any more, now that our degenerated currency has become about as valuable as stage money, but they break into homes where liquor is hoarded, murder the boozologist and sell their stolen liquor for incredible sums. There were three hundred murders committed in Chicago during the first eleven months of last year. In one day there were thirty-six hold-ups, twenty-eight automobile thefts, several pistol battles, numerous safe blowings, and one hundred and thirty criminals were arrested. You would have to arrest a hundred thousand of Chicago's crooks to make any impression on the criminals in that city. Sixteen boys, mostly foreigners, were also arrested and among these were eight murderers; so please do not wonder that I worried about my precious eggs.

I always thought that government operation of railroads, ownership and operation of natural resources would be the salvation of this nation, but, alas, that was when I did not know the kind of nation we had. As Billy the Goat says, we've got an abomination now, not a nation, and no one will do for the Government half what he will do for a private employer. Uncle Sam implores us to raise food, then permits his employees to destroy it. Some day I'm going down to Washington to see if some one hasn't swiped our dear old original Uncle Sam and camouflaged us with a Bolshevik fake that is running the country to hades.

A Red Ark sailed down from New York Bay the other day with two hundred and fifty wild-eyed anarchist firebrands aboard and hundreds more are to follow, so actually Uncle Sam must have a kick left in him, after all. Berkman and Goldman, the two notorious Russian Jew anarchists, were among the bunch. It has taken thirty years to get these troublemakers out of the country. If this bunch had been deported five years ago or even two years ago, half the trouble we are experiencing from these lunatics would have been avoided. When a patient is sick, or crazy, we send for the doctor or the authorities right away. Uncle Sam waits until his patient is dead or nearly dead and until the lunatics have torn his country to pieces. However, deporting a few hundred or a few thousand Bolshevists won't stop the activities of these vermin in this country. As usual, we are cutting off a few poisonous leaves instead of uprooting the tree. We had to go to Germany to lick Germany. Deporting Boy-Ed and Von Papen didn't do the job, and if Democracy and civilization are to be saved someone will have to go to Russia and destroy Bolshevism just as we had to go to Europe to destroy Kaiserism. It's a tough job but it's got to be done unless the Reds become civilized and mend their ways. Russia has two Czars now instead of one and a horde of Chinese mercenaries to shoot up those who fail to do the Jew Czar's biddings.

Billy the Goat says the late war was a war between a nation of waiters and a nation of cooks. Uncle Sam must be pro-German, for he is the world's champion waiter. Nations, like individuals, go crazy at times. Not all of our people, however, thank God, are crazy. Though the Allies and ourselves licked Germany, we lost the war, as you will find to your sorrow before many *years ha*ve passed over your heads, unless you keep your eyes on both Hun and Bolshevik. However, something good has come out of this war and that is the American Legion, which, next to COMFORT's League of Cousins, is the greatest force for good this country has ever known. Just what the Legion is, what it stands for (and it stands for everything that is noble and glorious) I will tell you some other time. Thank God, however, we have got it, and if there are any of you boys who are entitled to get into it and have not done so, for God's sake hustle up and join its ranks, for it has the only ranks that can down the cranks.

A. A. Ossendoffsky has carefully estimated that the ravages of Bolshevism have cost Russia 12,280,000 lives, and this murder fest is still running strong and likely to continue. That high-browed, visionless visionary, Raymond Robbins, the gentleman with the outdoor mind and the indoor delusions, could walk from one end of Russia to the other without seeing a single corpse. I have lived in Russia and have been surrounded by a quarter of a million Russians for years, and I think I know more about that people, or one branch of it than the gentleman in question will ever know. I've had these gentry with gleaming eyes and glistening teeth poke their faces into mine and say, "We must have a revolution and we can't have it without blood." And yet these were all prosperous men with fine homes and everything a human being could reasonably desire. Nevertheless, they want to turn society upside down. They have got the money, now they want the power, and their greed for both these commodities is insatiable. When the orthodox Jew throws overboard the faith of his fathers and becomes infected with revolutionary ideas, he is more dangerous than a safety razor factory, and our immigration authorities should see that none of his kind get into this country, for it is they who have done more than all the rest of the world put together to spread poisonous doctrines and to raise general hades. Berkman, Goldman, Rose Pastor Stokes, Victor Berger (an Austrian Jew, according to the New York Tribune), Bela Kun, Kurt Eisner, Liebnecht, Trotzky and a huge majority of the Bolshevist officials, are Jews. Maximilian Harden, the famous journalist, himself a Jew, had to publicly rebuke members of his own race for grabbing all the political jobs during the German upheaval. The result is a wave of anti-Semitism in Germany. God knows, I wish these fearful pogroms could be stopped, but it is the apostate, revolutionary Jew who has brought these fearful visitations upon the heads of his reputable and law-abiding brother.

There is plenty of food in Russia and almost up to the gates of Vienna, but the farmers have hidden it or won't part with it. They want real values, clothes, shoes, implements, groceries, in return for their produce, and not stage money. The world is being flooded with stage money. Every country, including this, is loaded with it, thanks to the war. We can't eat or clothe ourselves with dirty paper, and, by the way, paper is getting so dear we soon won't be able to get any of that. Don't howl at high prices; they are not high prices, they are just high foolishness. It is commodities we want. Some people get a lot of satisfaction out of seeing a dog chasing its tail, though that performance never amused me. Society is doing that very thing today, chasing its tail, and revolving in a vicious circle that will get it nowhere. Thousands of political pill doctors (and we shall probably have old Doc Bryan among the bunch) are ready to solve all our troubles if we will only swallow their dope. Take my advice and avoid the political fakers. Swallowing wood alcohol labeled whiskey only killed thirty-eight persons within a radius of a few miles in Massachusetts the other day. Those it does not kill it blinds. That's what Bolshevism does. We are still suffering from the effects of a terrific storm and instead of letting the captain on the bridge run the ship and keep us off the rocks, we are all indulging in a fierce wild jazz, an orgy of extravagance, stupidity, crime, murder and everything else that is devilish. Every one thinks he can run the ship better than the captain. Every one wants to try a new course, though the fog is so dense he can't see an inch ahead. Keep your heads, say your prayers, hold on to the old faith; a middle-of-the-road policy that is neither dangerously radical nor stupidly reactionary, neither Bolshevik nor Bourbon, is the only policy that can help us weather the storm, and, above all, look out for the pacifists and the gang who were pro-Germans before the war, for they are still singing Deutschland over the Allies and over Uncle Sam. Milwaukee has seceded from the Union. The Kaiser raised hell, and once hell is raised it takes a long time for things to quiet down. When the patient is on the operating table and the surgeon is using the knife, don't turn out the light or jab the surgeon's arm or you will kill the patient. Just be prayerful and patient and trust in God for the rest. But remember, we shan't pull through by merely sitting still. You must fight every force of evil about you, and the forces of evil were never so strong as at present. Don't do the foolish virgin act and go to sleep with your lamps unfilled. Fill the lamp of faith and keep vigilant watch for the rascals who would overturn this Republic, and keep ever handy a heart full of compassion and a helpful dollar for the nations of the earth who have been stricken into the dust.

P. S. We are a million cattle short and it will take years to bring our beef supply up to normal. That means high prices of beef for many a long day. Kicking won't grow cattle, only time, money and hard work will accomplish that or anything else that mad fools think can be achieved by theorizing, dreaming and agitating.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter? Is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

WASHINGTON, 730 Seventh St., N. E., D. C.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Five years ago you were my idol and my ideal, but now you are shattered and fallen, since you have started your songs of hate and your praise and advocacy of the same militarism that we went to Germany to crush. I don't see how you could forsake your doctrine of the universal brotherhood of man. God knows I hate the German military caste and system and that is why I don't want such things in this country, but I can't believe that the German working masses were in sympathy with their war lord's war of aggression, and therefore I do not and cannot hate the German masses. May I ask just what kind of militarism you advocate in this country? I know you would not agree with me that it is the German brand, but what is the difference? Let us avoid in this country what we killed in the Central Powers.

FRANKLIN BEST.

Franklin, I have never advocated militarism for this or any country. Militarism is a disease and a menace and only a German mind could fail to note the difference between the hideous war machine which the Kaiser created and with which he terrorized Europe and the world at large for thirty years, and the puny forces this country has been in the habit of keeping under arms. To compare any kind of military training for the protection of our land with that of the Kaiser's murder machine, is an insult to a country that has looked to the ocean for its protection and to God Almighty to do for it what it had not sense to do for itself. What I advocated in the November issue of COMFORT are things which are absolutely necessary for the protection and the welfare and physical and spiritual needs of the rising generation. If you can find a trace of militarism in that article you are the type of man who could discover moral degeneracy in an unborn babe. We did not kill militarism in Germany, we merely helped to can it temporarily, then hiked home, leaving the Allies sitting disconsolately on the lid, which sooner or later will be again blown off and the old murder-fest will be begun all over again. I have never forsaken my ideals of universal brotherhood. If I did, I would feel that I was guilty of demolishing the corner stone of that Christianity on which rests all our hopes. In the January issue of COMFORT you will note that I asserted that nationalism is our stay but universal fraternity is our hope. To have brotherhood among men, however, we must first have justice and mete out punishment to the guilty. Germany has put the hands of the clock of brotherhood and idealism back a couple of centuries or more with her poison gas, her submarines, Zeppelins, Big Berthas and other forms of fiendishness which only devils could devise and fiends incarnate use. She has torn the bowels out of Europe, pulled down the pillars of civilization, made the world a graveyard, loaded humanity with debt and crushed it with despair and transformed the entire earth into one vast bughouse, filled with anarchy and madness. Only a united Germany, dazzled with a dream of world conquest, plunder and loot, could have dragged the world into such an abyss as Germany has done. In spite of this, you have the nerve to ask me to take the German people who accomplished this hideous thing and who are utterly unrepentant and unregenerate, and whose hands are stained with the blood of millions of victims, to my breast, kiss them and slobber over them and forgive and forget the horrors they have wrought. If universal brotherhood is ever to come, it cannot come by condoning crime, but by punishing it. Let Germany repent in sackcloth and ashes and let the Germans in this country who uphold Germany and glory in her criminal acts, do the same thing. Those who tried to start German opera recently in this city were mobbed. Kriesler, the great violinist, was refused a hearing. Infuriated citizens have declined to permit the sale of German dolls. This shows the temper of our people. Their wounds are too sore, their hearts too full of grief to stand anything German for the present at least, and while their heads are bowed with anguish over their dead, every German or German sympathizer should have the decency at least to keep silent, but instead they send a German sympathizer backed by thousands of pro-Kaiser votes to Congress—an impudent challenge! The President, when speaking in the Northwest, was forced to draw our attention to the fact that the German menace in this country was raising its head again. Good, honest Americans of German blood should try and put some sense into those German-speaking colonists who refuse to become absorbed, and who, though they have their bodies and bank books here, have their hearts on the Rhine. Franklin, I notice that I ceased to be your idol five years ago when the war broke out and I warned COMFORT readers of the German menace. That shows pretty conclusively where your sympathies lie. As a step towards helping Uncle Sam and the country which gives you your bread and butter, let me advise you not to use the stationery of the Treasury Department, which is Uncle Sam's property, for your private correspondence. Let William Hohenzollern supply you with stationery free from now on. If I am shattered and fallen, I at least did not fall into the Kaiser's arms. Uncle Sam is still behind Uncle Charlie, and he's the only Uncle I give a darn for.

MAX, NEBR.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I agree with you about the aliens and compulsory military training. I am almost of age to go to train and I would go, oh, so gladly, and I also believe almost every boy in the country today would go, too, except the rowdies, rough necks, American haters and the spineless scum of the gutters. I believe all our bright worth-while boys would welcome the chance to train. I would like for some young boys and girls to write to me. I was a little too young to go to the front in this war but say I sure would like to have gone. Keep up your good work, Uncle Charlie.

Your loving nephew, O. B. DOAK (JACK).

Jack, if I have got your name twisted, don't blame me, that is your fault. Strange that so many people, even among the well educated, will not write their own names legibly. Half the addresses we have to guess at. When my box of letters comes down from COMFORT, I find half the contents of the box are from perfectly dear people who think right, do right and live right. They are just fine, level-headed, lovable folks. The balance of the letters are from people, all of whom have got a different bug, religious fanatics, Bolshevists, soreheads, cranks, and nuts who never agree with anything or anybody, including themselves. Nothing is right, nothing satisfies them. Ignorance, stupidity, bigotry, hate, narrow mindedness, Hun-Americanism and everything mean and contemptible, irrational and impractical, bobs up in the pages of these letters. It is a terrible task to construct a worth-while world, even with good human material, but when you have to build a universe that will suit every old fanatic, what are you going to do? You have an impossible task. You must catch the human animal when he is young, catch him before his plastic brain has absorbed any crazyisms, either religious, political or economic, if you are going to do anything with him. That's a hard task but it will have to be done and will be done some day, for, though we invite differences of opinion, we do not want to breed hordes of zealots, freaks and fanatics. First of all, we must have a country, and you can't have a country unless you keep it secure from foes within and foes without, and peopled by a race that is in agreement on certain fundamental principles of honor, truth and decency. It logically follows, then, that we must have military training along democratic lines, if we wish to have a country, for a country that cannot protect itself will not long exist. To have a nation, we must have healthy bodies and healthy minds. So take the boys, and the girls, too, if you can, out in the country for a few months every year and teach them a trade so they can be millionaire bricklayers instead of starving poets and bookkeepers. The American Legion has mapped out a plan along these lines and I am behind it and Jack Doak is with me, and so is every other boy who is a real hundred per cent., red-blooded, honest-to-God American. Mr. Franklin Best, whose letter precedes this, can study Jack Doak's letter to advantage. We can struggle along very nicely with the Jack Doaks, but the Lord knows

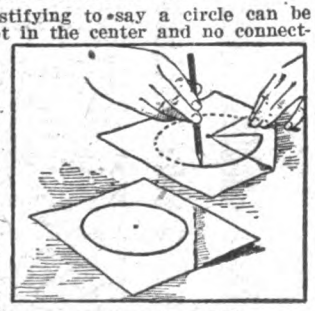
As yet, there are no electric cars in the Dominican Republic. The capital, Santo Domingo City, with a population of about 25,000 inhabitants, and Santiago, are the only towns in the republic of sufficient importance to warrant such service.

An Evening's Sport

Ring Toss



A CIRCLE of wood, or an old wooden bucket cover, some fruit jar rubbers that have done service, and a dozen right-angle hooks are all that are required to make this fascinating indoor game which children and grown-ups enjoy equally well. Screw the hooks into the wood, numbering them one to twelve. Through the top edges bore a hole to hang the board on the wall. The game is to toss the rubbers over the hooks, and each player has a "turn" with six rubbers. Add the numbers beneath the hooks on which the rubbers have caught. The player making the highest addition wins the game.

HANG THE BOARD ON THE WALL.

Dot in the Circle Trick

It is very mystifying to say a circle can be drawn with a dot in the center and no connecting line without lifting the pencil from the paper, yet it is true. First fold one corner of a square piece of paper so that the corner will come exactly to the center of the paper. At this point make the dot, and then without lifting the pencil, run it up the turned-over corner a short way and begin to draw the circle. When the opposite side of turned-over corner is reached, turn it to place and finish the circle.

DOING THE TRICK.

Egg in the Bottle Trick

You can surprise your friends by showing them an egg in a bottle the mouth of which is smaller than the egg. This appears quite impossible, when in fact it is a very simple trick. Soak an egg in strong vinegar until the shell becomes pliable; then it can be slipped into the bottle. Fill the bottle with cold water, allowing it to remain until the egg-shell becomes hard again.

Her Chiffonier Lochinvar

"LOUEEZY."

"Huh?"

"Get out from under there. I'm going to pitch down these here quilts. They're wet as sop."

The girl addressed laid her cord crocheting in her lap, and adjusted more comfortably one of the tight rolls of curl papers which adorned her flaxen head. She reluctantly removed her feet from the oven in which they were toasting, rose, stretched, yawned, and moved with indolent grace to the small, many-paned window.

There was a sound of brisk tramping back and forth over the planks which formed the floor of the loft overhead, and, one after another, sodden quilts were flung through the opening in the ceiling of the kitchen to the floor beneath. They were heavy quilts made from men's pants cloth and lined with thick outing flannel. Finally the deluge ceased, and a woman descended the ladder which formed the stairway to the loft.

She was a distinct contrast to her sister, in movement as well as appearance; little, with dark eyes, and black hair drawn smoothly away from her face into a large knot at the back of her head. She pounced on the wet mass of bedding like an energetic robin after a worm, and carried the heavy quilts, one after another, out of the house and hung them on a line in the sun.

On her trips back and forth through the kitchen she sputtered to her sister. This makes three times this week I've lugged these things out to dry. I declare to goodness, if I could get hold of any money, I'd buy the shingles and fix the roof myself. It wouldn't be a mite harder work than tugging these heavy quilts out and in."

When she had finished she dropped into a chair, flushed and breathless. "I declare, I'm plumb beat out," she panted. "I wish you would ask pa to fix that roof, Loueezy. He might do it if you would ask him. Will you?"

Her sister did not look up. "No," she snapped, "I won't. I want a new dress, and I can't get money out of him for both. Let the roof leak. I should worry."

"You wouldn't say that if you had to carry them heavy comfortables around, and what you want with a new dress beats me. You just got one, and land knows your clothes are a sight better than mine now."

"What does an old maid like you want of clothes anyway? You never go nowhere," Louise retorted. Laying her work down, she gazed curiously at her sister. "Did you ever have a beau, Mandy, or was you born an old maid?" she asked mockingly.

The elder woman's face flushed darkly and her work-hardened fingers picked nervously at her apron. "I'm not so old, Loueezy," she said depreciatingly. "Thirty ain't old, and, as for fellows, I had some, too, when I was twenty or thereabouts, but when they found I wouldn't marry and leave pa and you kids to get along alone, they quit coming. You see I was only fifteen when ma died and you was five. When I was at the courting age you was too young to take care of four men folks so I just naturally had to stay."

"I wouldn't of, not for nobody," Louise retorted. "What thanks did you ever get?"

"Maybe I was foolish, but I would never of felt right about it if I had gone, so I guess it was all for the best. Seems like I wouldn't mind it so much, if pa was only like the other farmers around here. They have nice houses, and the women seem to have real good times. They have washing machines, oil stoves, linoleums on their kitchen floors, and lace curtains to their windows. Some of them have parlor organs and Mrs. Best has even got a talking machine, and her man hasn't got so much land as pa has. Pa is so set in his ways," she continued with a sigh. "He calls all them things newfangled contraptions and says we shan't spend his hard-earned money that way. We haven't got nothing but leaky roofs and saggy doors."

"He is stingy, that's what ails him," Louise asserted. "Well, I don't care whether he fixes things up or not. All I am aiming to do is to get married and get away from here, and I expect to do that before long," she added with a meaning glance at her sister.

"Who are you going to marry?" Mandy asked with a queer sinking sensation at the pit of her stomach.

"Joe Fifield," Louise answered, and then continued, half apologetically. "Course I know he is fifteen years older than me, but he has got a good farm with a nice house on it an——"

"I thought you always said you wouldn't live on a farm," Mandy interrupted hopefully.

"No more I won't either but as I was sayin' he has got a good farm that will bring in lots of money. I'll make him sell it and then I'll live in the village, have silk dresses, and go to the movies every day if I want to."

"You'd never get Joe to sell his farm. He thinks a pile of it, and he likes farming." Her tone was unmistakably triumphant.

"Oh, yes he would. I wouldn't give him a minute's peace until he did," Louise answered confidently.

"Has he asked you yet?" Mandy's breath hung on the answer.

"Well no, not exactly, but he has hinted some about being lonesome since his ma died and he said he guessed he'd have to get him a wife. I told him though," she concluded mischievously, "that no one need come courting around here unless he had an auto."

"An auto," the elder sister replied in an awed voice.

"Yes, an auto," Louise mimicked.

"What did he say?"

"He said, 'What if a fellow hasn't got the money to buy one?' and I said, 'Let him get it then.' He's going to, too," she concluded triumphantly. "He started peddling rags, as soon as he finished his summer's work,—about a month ago."

"Peddling rags. Well I should think he would be ashamed of himself. Rag peddling is no job for an able-bodied man, unless he is a furriner."

"Oh, you are way behind the times," Louise sniffed impatiently. "There is money in junk now, since the war began, and it ain't no disgrace either. Ladies' Aid Societies and school children all over are collecting papers and stuff and selling them."

Mandy usually had nothing to say in criticism of her sister's idle ways, as she had long since learned that talking did no good, but this morning as she went about her work in the small lean-to that served as kitchen and dining-room, as well as cloak room for the four men, she regarded her impatiently.

"Seems to me," she remarked at last, "you might better be learning how to do housework if you intend to get married. Crochet work won't feed a man, and you can't boil water without burning it."

"No, thanks," Louise retorted airily. "If I learn how, I'll have to do it."

Mandy did not answer, but took the broom and dustpan and began to tidy the living-room and bedrooms. The bedrooms were merely the space occupied by two cheap pine bedsteads set with their tall headboards together. They were wedged tightly into one end of the living-room, and partitioned from the rest of the room by turkey-red print drape. Privacy between the two bedrooms was insured by tacking the drapes to the headboards of the beds. The floor of the living-room was of soft knotty pine and so worn down between the knots by frequent scrubbings that it was as rough as a newly ploughed field. The furniture was cheap, scanty and old.

Mandy was accustomed to all these things, but this morning they seemed to irritate her. Perhaps the heavy quilts had made her back ache a little more than usual. Perhaps Louise's taunt about being an old maid rankled more than her careless unkind speeches usually did. At any rate, she felt out of sorts. Perhaps the falling leaves and the chill autumn breeze blowing in at the open window, and rattling the green paper shades, had something to do with her loneliness and discontent. She went to the small, low, west window and stood looking down the road. The road was really nothing but a lane as it ended at their house. There was no travel past their farm as almost everyone turned either north or south at the crossroads, a quarter of a mile away.

When Mandy was very young, she had dreamed of the time some one would come down that road and take her away from the dreary life she led into a happier one. She had never heard of that young Lochinvar who came out of the west, but in her own crude way she expected him. When he finally did come in the person of young Joe Fifield, a farmer lad, she had had to refuse to go with him on account of the motherless brood dependent on her for care.

He had been hurt, had chosen to believe that she did not care for him, and had gone away. She had not seen him again for almost ten years, until he had called a few weeks before, and had been appropriated by Louise as her special property.

"Seems as if I wouldn't care quite so much, if Loueezy would only try to learn how to take care of him when she gets him," Mandy thought, but her heart was rebellious.

One evening about a month later as Joe was expected, the girls changed their dresses, Mandy to a blue gingham, and Louise to a gaudy purple cotton foulard. The boys, three stolid, stupid, overgrown hulks of manhood, came in, in the overalls they had worn all day. Their only concession to the niceties of life was the removal of their heavy cowhide boots disclosing to view thick white socks much darned as to heels and toes, and with brown, stained soles.

The old farmer was still fumbling around out in the kitchen for his tobacco and pipe, when Joe arrived. Louise, who was arranging her frizzed bangs and side curls before a cracked mirror, rushed to open the door and ushered him in with many coy glances and simpering smiles. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, sunburned man, every line of his body bespeaking strength and energy.

"Hello, Joe, how's the rag business?" was his greeting from the boys.

"Fine, couldn't be better," he answered with a nod at Mandy, who was sewing on a brightly-colored quilt which was spread across her knees.

"What's that you're making, Mandy?" he asked, when his new business, the weather, and crops and livestock had been thoroughly discussed.

"It's just one of her everlasting quilts," Louise interrupted. "She is always making them. That one has over a thousand pieces in it and some of them ain't any bigger than my thumbnail." She gave a conscious flirt of her pretty white hand, and effectually drew his attention away from Mandy, for the moment. His eyes went from the brown, toil-hardened hands holding the needle to the soft white ones busied with the flying crochet hook.

Just then Mr. McNut came in. He was an undersized, wizened man with long white hair, and a tobacco-stained beard. His little bleared blue eyes lit up with curiosity.

"Howdy, Joe," he cackled. "Which one of the gals be you sparkin'?"

"Both of them, Mr. McNut, both of them," said Joe, a smile lighting up his plain face. The old man was a type of farmer almost extinct. He was an ignorant, narrow-minded man, looked down upon when not entirely ignored by his more progressive neighbors. Joe himself was recognized and respected as a thrifty, up-to-date farmer, although not a wealthy one by any means.

His jest was greeted by the boys and their father with uproarious merriment, and Louise also found food for much laughter and blushing.

"Oh, pa," she tittered. "You know Mandy is too old to have a beau."

Mandy looked keenly at Joe, her busy needle idle for a moment. He was looking at Louise. Her pretty, swiftly-moving hands seemed to fascinate him. The curve of her soft cheek was alluring, for the lamplight did not reveal the sallowness of her skin but shone on her frizzed curls, making an aureole of them. She was undeniably pretty, and Mandy knew that, in spite of the fact that "Handsome is as handsome does, and "Beauty is only skin deep," it is beauty of face and not of disposition that shows when one is young, and Louise was young. Mandy stifled a sigh and went back to her work.

She was startled into idleness again in a few moments, however, by her sister's bold question,

AN ATTIC CHAMBER.

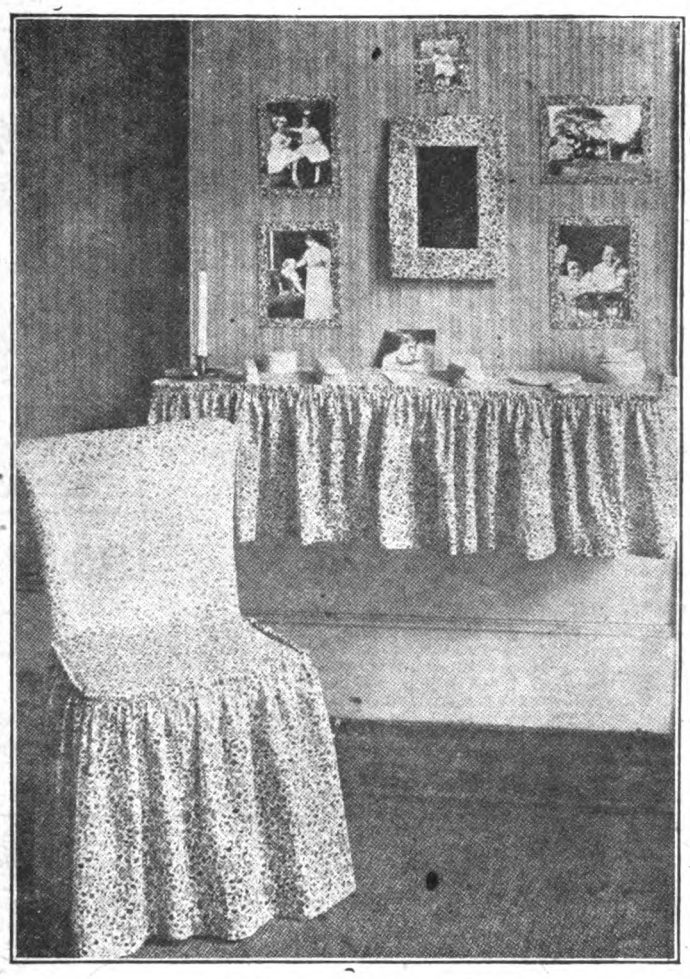
The corner case, together with the complete scheme of furnishings, is very simple of construction. There are three shelves, deep enough to hold good-sized books, the top one being within reaching distance without the aid of a stool. The upper and middle shelves are kept from sagging by supports at ends and corners and midway between, and on one side, where the books are particularly heavy, another strip holds the three shelves securely. Over the books on either side, hung from the moulding, are framed imitation prints; one of woods and water, the other a boating scene, while the wall space beneath the first shelf is devoted to photographs of dear friends whose faces remind us of events in much the same way as do the titles of the books above.

A deep-seated couch provides comfortable lounging quarters in this retired corner, and at the foot is a pretty table, a home-made affair, convenient for the children's school books. Of great interest is the antique sewing table at the head of couch, and the air of refinement it lends with its cover of old-fashioned filet and vase of flowers.

A very different, yet equally desirable plan has been worked out in the second arrangement where one side of the bookcase forms an end to the window-seat, made deep enough to serve as a couch. A thick cushion and pillows give an air of luxury and comfort, and the whole effect adds materially to the furnishings of the room. The bookcase is built sufficiently deep to hold magazines and sheet music, and has a partition through the center. This depth allows room for two rows of books on each shelf, the back rows to be filled with books the least used. A further library effect is gained by placing a bust of Lincoln and one of Washington on top, and a few well-chosen pictures above. A chair of old-fashioned type, and a velvety rug in a two-toned Oriental pattern adds the correct touches to this corner.

Chamber Interiors



By first bearing in mind that chambers are to sleep in and not an abiding place for odd and useless articles, we have made a good start on chamber furnishings. The very word "bedroom" suggests rest; a place in which we can hide away from all that is disquieting. Therefore let its surroundings express simplicity, individuality and usefulness, doing away with anything that is not pleasing to look at, or suggests a lack of repose. For the foregoing reasons, I have selected these two illustrated chamber interiors as a guide, their possibilities being quite out of the ordinary for the use of favorite colors, the opportunity to utilize materials on hand, and for personal expression.

The first suggests a veritable place of refuge, in the attic, away from intrusion. The beamed ceilings and sheathed walls are stained the softest shade of moss green. The floor has been treated the same, only the shade is much deeper. The rug is of log-cabin weave in shades of soft green alternating with stripes of white. A recessed window forms an alcove which has been well utilized. In the corner is a washstand patterned after an old-fashioned design, and it holds only necessary toilet articles. Under the window ledge is a towel rod made from a piece of broom handle let into wooden brackets. In the opposite corner is a chest of three drawers, cushioned attractively by covering an old, folded blanket. A pillow nestled into the corner completes a comfortable window-seat.

The chiffonier is a framework with solid top and open front. For drawers, cretonne-covered, heavy pasteboard boxes are used, and these rest on light runs which extend across the four sides. Overhead, to the side, is a large utility box covered to match the chiffonier. For pleasing ornamentation we observe a few books by favorite authors, a candlestick given by a dear friend, and photographs of beloved faces.

Curtains used as a protection for chamber garments are also decorative against the plain wall. A stocking bag and an hour-glass table suggest quiet hours spent in sewing in this retreat. All the cretonne is alike; a pale pink ground with a floral design of soft gray, and in perfect harmony with the moss-green walls.

The other bedroom illustration gives a glimpse of a young girl's chamber, where sweet simplicity is the dominating feature. Done in sunfast rosebud calico, the effect is of something far more expensive. Clever hands have made cardboard photograph frames and covered them with calico, and with like ingenuity covered and ruffled a shelf to use as a dressing table, and covered a chair with calico as well. The background for all this is a two-toned light gray paper, woodwork of white and a large art rug of matting.

CALICO EFFECTIVELY USED.

A Wall Closet

Utilizing space and saving steps by having things within easy distances is the key to modern arrangements. If your house boasts of one or more closets built into the wall, I need not tell you of their convenience; you already know. But if it does not, your plan of arrangement is lacking a strong point. A wall closet for medicines out of reach of the children is indispensable, and wherever the want of a closet is felt with no possible way of building one, utilizing the thickness of the wall will answer many a purpose.

In building a new house, where there is a "jog", quite frequently a wall timber can be cut without weakening the wall. This gives opportunity for a deeper closet.

The illustration shows a jog the depth of a fireplace, the end of which is utilized for a deep wall closet with the upper two thirds finished with open shelves, while the lower third has a door.

Usually these closets have the same finish given the doors and windows in the same room.

An English Sideboard

Old, yet ever new and desirable, is this old English type of sideboard in which simplicity and beauty have been well combined. More than this, its popularity will never wane so long as the housewife delights in displaying her collection of pretty, interesting and curious china, pottery, pewter and glassware, which I predict and hope will ever be, for it is in keeping with the best traditions of home making. The illustration shows how large a display can be made without any appearance of crowding.

Just as the early ones were hand made, so today is this type being copied by the "man at home" who knows how to make straight edges, square corners, can "join", put in a drawer and hang a door. The sideboard is made by first constructing a table with two deep drawers that extend the entire length. A back, the desired height, is put on with ends set in a little from the edge of table. On this is the top shelf, which should extend a little over the ends and front edge. A shelf running the entire length is put in a little over one third the distance from table top. There is a closet at each end between the top and lower shelf, made by partitions, and doors the full size of opening. A short shelf between the closets completes the sideboard.

Two old leather-covered trunks are kept under the sideboard. The larger one is used for table linen. Trays have been put into the smaller one, making it an ideal silver chest. These antique trunks and the sideboard are of about the same period.

"I left you at Sunset Ranch, and now we meet in this desolated city! I cannot understand it."

An inscrutable smile played about Irma's lips.

"I followed Berdyne and his lawyer hireling," she murmured, and was on the same train that brought them to San Francisco, although they had no knowledge of it. They evaded me at the Townsend Street station, and I had gone to the Palace Hotel, where Berdyne usually stays when in the city. He was not there. I had no more than learned this when the shock came, and I was thrown out in the street, with all the other guests. Since then," she added, "I have been a wanderer.

"A little while ago I chanced to see Trenwyck in Portsmouth Square——"

"Trenwyck?" queried Beryl.

"The man who brought you here," explained Irma.

"He told me his name was Percival!"

"He will tell you anything that best suits his purpose. As I was saying, I saw him, and I followed him in the hope that he would lead me to Berdyne. But he did not. To my astonishment, he met the man Gorsline, talked with him a little, and then I was dumbfounded to see him approach the Stevenson Memorial and address you. I thought there was something wrong, and, when you and he left the square, I followed you.

"Waiting and listening at the side of the house, I was not long in discovering that you had been brought to this room and made a prisoner. After the door closed, and I knew your jailer was gone, I came in through the wrecked window."

"You brought me joy and hope when you came to me before," said Beryl, with a quivering lip, "and now you bring me liberty—release from one whom I would rather die than meet again!"

"I am your friend in need, Miss Grayson," said Irma, "and yet I cannot call myself your friend. What I do is because of my love for Nicholas Berdyne, and because I would see that you are removed from his power forever." Her eyes flashed and her bosom heaved with its pent-up emotions. "And now tell me," she went on, with feverish eagerness, "are you the bride of Neil Preston?"

"Yes," answered the wretched girl, with brimming eyes, "but I fear that—that he is dead!"

"Hush!" cautioned the woman. "You must not give way to your grief here. One lurks beyond that door who is capable of anything. Do you feel well enough to leave this house? Are you able to walk?"

"Indeed, I am strong—stronger than you think!"

"Then come with me. We will get away from here before Gorsline discovers that you have been released. Trenwyck has left the place. Neither he nor Gorsline knows where to find Berdyne, yet the lawyer is even now looking for him among the crowds of fugitives. Amid such confusion as reigns in this city at present, it is labor wasted to try to find anyone."

"It seems a providence," said Beryl, "that you were able to find me."

Irma, climbing to the sill of the window opening, leaped lightly to the ground, and immediately assisted Beryl to descend beside her. Then they fled into the street.

It was like balm to the stricken Beryl's wounded heart to find one who, while not claiming to be even a friend, was yet to be trusted. She yielded herself entirely into Irma's hands and permitted her to be the guide.

Irma Lee seemed to know exactly where she should go. Without a moment's hesitation, she struck out boldly through the torn and broken streets.

"Tell me what happened to you," she said, as they hurried along.

In breathless and broken sentences Beryl told of her flight from Sunset Ranch with her sweetheart and her dear friend, the Mexican; told of the arrival in San Francisco, of the marriage at the rectory, of the earthquake, the wicked work of Berdyne when Neil was stricken down, and of her escape and her miserable wanderings.

A strange, wild joy glowed in Irma's face when she learned that the earthquake had come after the wedding ceremony, and jealous hate took the place of exultation when Beryl narrated how Berdyne had spirited her away in the automobile. The conclusion of the sad story left Irma thoughtful and silent.

"It cannot be," said she, "that your husband is dead. If he had been, you would have found him lying in that room where he was stricken down. In the awful events of the day, the maimed and injured have claimed the attention of the authorities, and there was no time to look after the bodies of those who lost their lives."

Beryl had grasped at so many straws of hope, only to have them break in her hands, that she hesitated to draw courage from Irma's reassuring words. Yet, if her dear one had passed out of her life forever, she knew that she could not live. Out of her terrible ordeal black despair was rising and gaining the mastery over her.

"Mr. Preston," went on Irma, seeing how loath Beryl was to be beguiled by false hopes, "must have recovered and gone forth to search for you. No doubt, he was merely stunned by the falling masonry, and left the minister's house very soon after you did. I know something about him, Miss Grayson, and you may rest assured that he will move heaven and earth to find you."

Beryl made no answer, but her overburdened heart found relief in tears.

"You know, do you not," proceeded Irma, "that Mr. Preston has a cousin living on Nob Hill?"

"Neil told me that," replied Beryl, "a long, long time ago. But I could not go to any of Neil's people," she added, with a touch of pride.

No need for Irma Lee to ask why. All aristocratic Denver had heard of Neil Preston's love affair, and knew that his purse-proud people looked upon it with disfavor. All Denver knew, too, that Neil had remained loyal to his heart's choice, had broken with his relatives, and had declared that he would make his own way in the world hand-in-hand with Beryl.

"I believe I understand the sentiment that animates you," said Irma, "but I think it a mistaken sentiment at this time. Would not Mr. Preston think that, in this direful emergency, you would go to his cousin's for news of him? And would he not be likely to go there for news of you? Nob Hill is yet safe, and most of the houses are habitable. Perchance some of Neil's people are still there, for it is difficult to leave the city today. If you will be advised by me, Miss Grayson, you will put away your pride and go to the home of Neil's cousin.

"I cannot, I cannot!" answered Beryl, clenching her small hands tightly. "If my darling lives, he will find me; I will wait and pray for him to come."

That a girl, tried as Beryl had been, should still have so much spirit aroused Irma Lee's admiration.

"Very well," Irma replied. "I am taking you to Russian Hill, where some refugee friends of mine have pitched their camp. I know they will shelter you and protect you. Meanwhile," she added determinedly, "I shall continue my search for the man who would prove false to me; I am thoroughly familiar with the city, and believe that I will be successful. It may chance, too, that I shall find your husband; so, if you will remain on Russian Hill, it is possible I may be able to send him there."

"Heaven will repay you for your kindness to a poor, forlorn girl, Miss Lee," returned Beryl.

A hard look crossed the fading beauty of Irma Lee's face.

"I ask nothing of Heaven," said she, harshly, "but to bring me face to face with the man who would cast me aside for one who loathes and abhors him."

So the jealous, revengeful woman and the beautiful and sorrow-stricken girl continued on their way up the steep slope to the very crest of Russian Hill. Alas, if Beryl had only known that every step she was taking merely carried her farther and farther from the man she loved!

Yet it is often thus with our most cherished desires. Fate, at times, indulges in a strange play of cross-purposes.

CHAPTER XX.

THE STRANDED VAN.

The experiences which would usually come to a person only in the course of many years were passed through by many thousands of individuals on that one day which opened this tragic San Francisco drama. And in the three fiery days which marked the city's ordeal the events of an ordinary lifetime were crowded. The first shock, the crunching, groaning and shattering upheaval which disrupted buildings, broke the water mains, and released the fire demon, lasted but twenty-eight seconds; yet, in that brief period, the locks of youth were silvered as with age intellect was overthrown, millionaires beggared, lives crushed out, and misery untold heaped upon the devoted City of the Argonauts.

We have been seeking to follow but two of the half-million threads woven into the warp of the great disaster; and for these, indeed, each minute had its thrilling incident, each hour its exciting chapter. Humanity, for the time, had become the plaything of destiny; fate moved her pawn across the chessboard of life in a swift and bewildering fashion.

In the morning Beryl and Neil had missed a reunion by only a few fateful minutes; in the early afternoon Beryl had fled from the house in Sutter Street at the very moment when Neil was hastening to her rescue. And so the play of cross-purposes continued; at any moment their paths might cross, at any moment they might diverge wildly.

Neil, miraculously preserved from death, rushed into the street through a perfect avalanche of flying masonry. Through smoke and flame, a hot breath as from a furnace beating in his face, he staggered toward purer air and safety.

He fell before he had cleared the zone of danger. A brave cavalryman saw him, galloped to his aid, and dragged him to safety. Always the soldiers kept just ahead of the flames, driving the people out of harm's way; calm, resolute, undaunted, they earned a nation's praise for their gallant work all through that period of stress and peril.

Neil rested for a few minutes, then arose and hurried away. His darling had escaped from the house where she had been held captive. The evidence of this had been brought home to him, and he knew that he was not deceiving himself. Again she was like a bit of wreckage afloat on that sea of troubled humanity. He could only drift with the many currents and continue to hope and pray that he would find her.

In a little while, he scarcely knew how, he found himself advancing along a thoroughfare in the vicinity of Union Square. This breathing spot, like every other within the city limits, had been preempted by refugees. Government tents were going up for their accommodation, belongings of every conceivable sort were heaped high in the open spaces, and preparations were being made for a distribution of water and food. This was Wednesday afternoon; but at midnight three sides of the square were in flames and refugees and troops had retreated!

But we anticipate. Neil, in the thoroughfare that led to the square, pushed into a group of men and women who were clustered about a van piled high with trunks. The fire was close to the van, from which the horses had been removed—commandeered, most likely, by soldiers. A man on the seat of the vehicle cried out an offer of five hundred dollars to a passing automobile if it would take the van in tow and drag it to safety. The automobile, however, was filled with men wearing red crosses on their sleeves, and no attention was paid to the frantic offer of the man on the truck. The luggage was from one of the great hotels, and had been confided to one of the hotel employees.

With the man who had charge of the van was another. A quiver sped through Neil's nerves as he recognized the second individual as Berdyne's valet, Hargreaves.

"I will give you five hundred dollars," shouted Hargreaves, to the driver of the Red Cross automobile, "if you will save just one trunk for me!"

Still no attention was paid by those in the car. They had other and weightier business on hand, and the offer of a fortune could not have turned them aside.

"The trunk," shouted Hargreaves, almost beside himself, "contains valuable papers! It must be saved!"

A thrill shot through Neil Preston's frame. He pressed closer, a glint of fire in his dark eyes. He saw one of the trunks, canvas-covered, brass-bound, and with the name, "Nicholas Berdyne," and the address, "Denver, Colorado," lettered on the end. The trunk was well down in the pile that filled the van.

"Clear the way!" shouted the soldiers, charging toward the crowd. "The fire will be here in a few minutes! They're going to dynamite! Clear the way!"

Tossing his arms despairingly, the hotel employee leaped to the ground and joined the crowd that scurried along in front of the soldiers. Hargreaves, climbing upon a wheel of the van, struggled wildly to draw the canvas-covered trunk from the pile. But the work was beyond his strength. A soldier forced him roughly from the wheel.

"Move on!" the soldier commanded, waving a pistol in the valet's face.

Hargreaves cast one lingering look behind and joined the refugees in their flight. Neil, retreating slowly, saw a brick wall topple over upon the van, overturning it and breaking and scattering its contents. Berdyne's trunk, as he could see, had been thrown far out toward the opposite side of the street, shattered, overturned, and with its contents lying white on the littered pavement.

This mishap to the van and that particular trunk brought a daring thought into Neil's brain. To think, with him, was to execute. Swiftly turning aside from the fleeing group, he dashed to the opposite side of the street and returned on the track the driven refugees had covered. He sheltered himself behind piles of debris, for the most part creeping on hands and knees. The soldiers did not see him, and the fugitive citizens had their own lives to think of.

"A bold stroke for my darling Beryl!" murmured Neil, pushing recklessly on. "Fortune has given me this opportunity, and I would be a poltroon if I did not take advantage of it. Who knows but that the very paper that means a fortune to my sweet little bride may be among those lying there on the pavement? God grant that it be so! God give me strength to search and find them!"

Love was the spur of that brave, death-defying effort. It would have been strange if love had not brought the venture through to success; and, truly, fortune favors the brave.

By the time Neil reached the vicinity of the

there," indicating by a gesture a door which appeared to lead into another room.

Violet felt greatly relieved by this information, and she showed it plainly.

"I wonder what I am going to do for a night-robe," she remarked. 'I have none with me, nor any toilet articles, and it will be very inconvenient and uncomfortable to be without them."

"Well, miss, I can let you have a night-gown; 'twon't be a cambric one with lace and tucks and ruffles"—this with a slight sneer—"but it'll be clean and whole, and I'll tell your brother that you want a comb and brush."

"Thank you. I can get along very nicely, at least for a few days if I can have those things; oh, please tell Mr. Mencke to get a toothbrush also," Violet said, graciously, and then having satisfied her appetite, she took up the glass of water beside her plate and remarked:

"I would like to keep this glass for my flowers; may I?"

"I don't know any reason why you can't, miss," Sarah answered.

"Will you be kind enough to pass me that box?" Violet asked, pointing to a chair where her recent purchase lay.

The woman did as she was requested, and a quick look of delight swept over her face as the young girl opened it and removed the fragrant contents from their wrappers.

"You love flowers," Violet said, as she noted the wistful expression that crept into her eyes.

Her face hardened instantly, and she gave vent to a short, bitter laugh.

"What business have poor folks to like such things when they can't get what they want to eat?" she demanded, in a harsh, sullen tone.

"It is too bad, isn't it?" Violet said, in a sympathetic voice, "but you shall have some of these if you like," and separating some of the choicest from the others, she laid them upon the tray, and put the remainder in the glass.

Sarah shut her lips tightly together as if determined to return no acknowledgment for the unusual gift; but her eyes, nevertheless, lingered greedily on the lovely blossoms, as she lifted the tray and passed silently from the room.

CHAPTER XXIX.

VANE CAMERON FINDS HIS MATE.

"That was not a very encouraging beginning," Violet murmured, looking disappointed as she heard the lock clink again into its socket; "it is very evident that Sarah means to preserve her armor impenetrable to all blandishments; but she does love flowers, for she looked hungry for them, and the color rushed into her face when I told her that she should have some; so there must be a soft spot somewhere in her nature, and I must try and find my way to it."

If she could have seen the woman as she paused a moment at the top of the stairs to put her face down to the beautiful buds and blossoms, while she eagerly inhaled their fragrance, she might not have thought her armor so impenetrable as it had seemed.

"The little goose imagines that she is going to pull the wool over my eyes," Sarah muttered, with a suppressed laugh, as she went on her way, "but I've too much at stake to let her do that, though she's given Johnnie, poor boy, a treat in these posies that he's never had afore."

"Johnnie, poor boy!" was a little cripple, her only child, who had never walked a step, but was obliged to lie or sit all day, amusing himself as best he might, while his mother went out to earn what she could for their support. She loved him tenderly, was constantly planning some little pleasure for him, and her heart fairly gloated over these beautiful flowers which she knew would so delight him.

About half an hour later, she brought Violet the night-robe that she had promised, together with a cheap new brush, comb and toothbrush, and the young girl was sure that her manner was a little less brusque than before.

She replenished the fire, swept up the hearth, snuffed the candles, and then asked Violet if there was anything more that she could do for her.

Violet would have been glad to have her remain in the room all night, for she could not bear to think of sleeping alone in that strange house; but she could not bring herself to share her bed with her, so she told her no, thanking her for what she had done, and after she was gone, crept into her bed to try and forget herself in sleep.

* * * * * * *

We shall now have to glance back several weeks in order to gather up some stray threads of our story before we can go on with the plot.

We have already learned that Lord Cameron was in this country.

He had come to America in the latter part of the fall to look after some interests which he still had in New York, and to spend a little time with Wallace, between whom and himself a strong friendship existed.

After his arrival, the life of the young architect had not been quite so quiet and monotonous as before. Lord Cameron was widely known in the fashionable circles of New York, and he was of course eagerly sought after, when it was learned that he was in the city.

He not only accepted many of the invitations showered upon him, but secured like favors for his friend.

Wallace at first flatly refused to accompany him into society, but the young earl finally overcame his objections, and prevailed upon him to go with him occasionally.

His first appearance was at a drawing-room musicale given in one of the up-town palaces, where, it was said, some of the best amateur talent in New York was to favor the select audience that had been invited.

Lord Cameron and his friend arrived a little late, to find that every seat was taken, and that there was scarcely standing-room; but just as they were trying to edge their way into the great room they suddenly paused spellbound at the sound of a marvelously sweet voice which at that moment began to render a difficult air from a popular opera.

There was not a sound in the room save those clear, flexible tones, as they trilled forth in rich melodious measure, holding every listener in rapt attention.

"Who can she be?" whispered Lord Cameron to Wallace, as the voice ceased, and the orchestra took up a few measures of interlude. "Can you see her?"

They were near the door, and the huge pillar that supported the arch above them concealed the singer from their view.

"Yes," Wallace answered, craning his neck for a better glimpse, "I can see a very lovely lady of medium height and graceful form, with an exquisite complexion, star-like eyes—whether light or dark I cannot tell at this distance—and golden-brown hair."

"I am glad to hear that she is lovely, for any one with such a voice should be nothing else," replied Lord Cameron, and then the magic voice took up the air again, and the two friends stood breathless until it finished.

The enthusiastic applause that followed told that the delighted audience would not be appeased until they had been favored again by the divine voice, and during the excitement which prevailed over this encore, Wallace and Lord Cameron managed to get a little farther into the room, where the latter could now also command a view of the stage.

The songstress returned after a few moments, smiled and bestowed an appreciative little bow upon her audience, and then, in the most simple and unassuming manner, sang that charming little Irish ballad, "Come Back to Erin."

"Who is she?" whispered Lord Cameron to an acquaintance whom he saw near him, while his face was all aglow, and his eyes shone like stars.

"Miss Agnes Humphrey, a noted soprano in one of our city churches; charming, isn't she?" was the reply.

"Indeed she is," Lord Cameron answered, and he secretly resolved that he would obtain an introduction to Miss Humphrey before the evening was over.

The lady sang once more before the entertainment was concluded, and even more acceptably than before, after which she graciously responded to another encore, and when the programme was concluded, Lord Cameron sought his hostess and begged to be presented to the prima-donna of the evening.

Mrs. Van Vort readily complied with his request, and, judging from his lordship's conduct after that ceremony had been performed, he was even more pleased with Miss Humphrey personally than he had been with her as a singer.

Wallace was also presented to her, and found her a sweet, womanly woman, whom he felt it would be a pleasure to know more intimately.

They met her in society frequently after that, and it soon became evident that the young Earl of Sutherland had conceived something more than a friendly interest in her. At the end of three months he gravely informed Wallace that he had asked Miss Humphrey to become his wife, and she had accepted him.

"I am glad," Wallace answered, warmly, yet not without some emotion, for of course each knew that the other was thinking of Violet, "it is as it should be, Cameron, and I am sure that Miss Humphrey will make you a true and loving wife. She is a lady in every respect and will honor, both by her dignity and accomplishments, the position which you will give her. You do not need to have me tell you that I wish you all the happiness that a man can know in this world."

"I wish I could be as sure of your future happiness, Richardson, as I am of my own," Lord Cameron returned, as he clasped the hand that his friend had extended to him.

"It will come in the unknown future, perhaps," Wallace gravely responded, and his companion was sure that love for no woman save the one he had lost, would ever fill his heart.

Lord Cameron had intended to return to England by the last of January, but his betrothal to Miss Humphrey now changed his plans.

He succeeded in convincing his bride-elect that there was no wisdom in a long engagement, and that it would be for their mutual interest to have their marriage solemnized at an early date, and then sail immediately for their English home.

It was therefore arranged that the wedding should occur about the middle of April, and at once preparations were accordingly set on foot for the great event.

It was the social event of the season, and there was a great deal said about the "splendid match" which Miss Humphrey had made.

The lady herself belonged to a fine, although not a notably wealthy family, at least as wealth is estimated in these days of millionaires.

She had been well educated, and allowed the best advantages in music, for which she showed great love and marked talent, and having made herself proficient in the art, she devoted it to a noble cause, giving her services to the church where she worshiped, and often for the benefit of charitable objects.

She was beautiful in person and character, and was generally beloved in the circles where she moved. Many people felt that they would lose a dear personal friend when she should leave for her new home, while almost everyone acknowledged that she was eminently fitted to grace the high position to which she was going.

Many thought that it was very strange she should have lived to be twenty-three years of age and never have met any one whom she could love well enough to marry. But such was the fact. No one had ever touched her heart until that evening of her introduction to Lord Cameron, when she had instantly been attracted as strongly to him as he to her.

The young earl had no secrets from her. When he told her of his affection for her, he also confided to her his former attachment to Violet, with the story of its romantic and tragic ending, and Agnes Humphrey, instead of feeling that she had not won all that she ought to have of this grand man's love, felt that this very confidence—this opening of the innermost recesses of his heart—was the omen of even a deeper love for her than any he had ever experienced for another.

Many a woman with less depth of character would have been jealous and suspicious of a first love that had taken such a strong hold upon him; but she sweetly ignored self, and resolved to so fill his future with her own devotion, that his wound would be healed, and his heart finally yield itself wholly to her.

"She must have been very lovely," she remarked, while they were talking of Violet, "and what a sad, sad fate for one so young. I wonder——"

She broke off suddenly, while her thoughts flew instantly to the beautiful girl who had clasped her hand so gratefully at Bertha Lawrence's funeral, and who, looking down upon her with dewey eyes and tremulous lips, had thanked her with such sweet earnestness for the comfort which her gift of song had given her.

"You wonder what, dear?" Lord Cameron asked, curious to know why she had cut herself short all at once.

"I know a Miss Huntington—or at least I have met her—who seems very like the Violet whom you have described, and, strangely enough, her initials are V. D. H. I was wondering if she might not possibly be a relative of hers."

"I think not," Lord Cameron replied, with not a suspicion of the truth; "she had no relatives that I know of in New York. Has this Miss Huntington been at any of the receptions that we have attended?"

He thought it would be pleasant to see any one who resembled Violet, while he suddenly remembered the face that Wallace had seen in the passing carriage in London.

"I think she does not go into society at all," Miss Humphrey rsponded, "and I have never met her but twice. She was governess to a little blind girl who died, and at her request I sang at the child's funeral. She thanked me in such a sweet, touching way that I was at once drawn toward her, and wished that I could know her better. I have never seen her since, though I have been tempted to call upon her, for I think I should enjoy her friendship."

Lord Cameron also felt an unaccountable desire to know more of this young girl, but he told himself that it was a mere coincidence, and nothing more was said of Violet at this time.

A little later, when the startling account of her sudden disappearance was published in the papers and a large reward offered for tidings of her, he was again considerably exercised. But he thought it was only because of the strange correspondence of the name, and did not for a moment dream but that the girl whom he had helped to lay beneath the great beech at Mentone, was the one whom he had loved and mourned.

As it happened, Wallace was away for a few days at this time, having been called to Chicago on important business. This was the reason why he did not see the first startling reports as to how long it would be before he got that auto. She dropped her face in shamed silence as he replied.

"Not very long if business keeps up the way it has been."

"Then will you give me a ride?" she begged coquettishly, her head on one side.

"All you want," was his gallant answer.

"Loueezy likes to gad," old man McNut shrilled, in his high-cracked voice. "She is an easy-goin' piece, too. Never frets about fixin' up the house at all, while Mandy here is allus a naggin' me about it. She says the snow comes in in winter and the rain in summer. But I allus tell her, 'What was good enough fer mam and pap is good enough for ye.'"

With this sally, he shambled out of sight behind the red curtain and presently the bed creaked beneath his weight.

After Joe had taken his departure that night and the sisters were undressing behind the other half of the red curtain, Louise said in a sibilant whisper: "See how easy I worked him. He'll get that auto, and then we'll get married and I'll show you my idea of a good time." Mandy made no audible reply. If her heart whispered "Poor Joe," her sister could not hear it, and went to sleep making wonderful plans for her future as Mrs. Joseph Fifield.

Mandy herself lay wide-eyed and sleepless, staring into the dark future before her. Her last prop had been knocked away. Unrealized, even by herself, she had always hoped that Joe might possibly ask her again to marry him, but now that hope was dead. "It didn't take him long to forget," she whispered bitterly to herself.

In spite of her despair, she returned to her work the next day with the patience of a horse taught to walk the treadmill. The months that followed were keen torture to her. Louise went frequently to the village and told frequently of meetings with Joe, who still reported amazing progress.

"He said to tell you that he'd soon have it now," was her report one day in the latter part of April. "I suppose he wants you to begin buyin' my wedding outfit. Well, I don't care how soon you get it, either. I'm crazy to get away from this old shack."

The next evening, Louise and the boys having gone to a dance in the village, Mandy was sitting alone on the doorstep, wrapped in a thick woolen shawl, and watching, as usual, the road from the west. She could see a little red runabout coming toward her but expected that it would turn at the cross-roads. Instead, it came straight on and stopped in front of the gate. She gasped with amazement when she recognized its occupant as none other than her old sweetheart. A little jealous pang shot through her heart as she realized how he had hastened to fulfill the conditions imposed upon him by her sister. She felt tempted to refuse to look at the machine but curiosity conquered. She arose and hurried to the gate, where Joe sat calmly awaiting her.

"Won't you come in and stop a while?" she invited after the usual greetings had passed between them.

"How do you like my new automobile?" he countered. "Get in and I'll ride you around a bit. It's a nice moonlight night."

She shrank back timidly, fearing yet longing to go.

"Land no, Joe, I ain't fit," she demurred.

"Come on," he insisted, and she went.

When he finally set her down at the gate after an hour's exhilerating ride, he asked gently:

"Did you like it, Mandy?"

"Like it! Oh, Joe, it was just grand!"

"Well, now are you satisfied, Mandy? You've made me serve most as long a time as that fellow in the Bible did for Rachel. First you had to take care of your father and the children. They are grown up at last and Louise is old enough to do for them, so there is nothing to hinder us getting married now, is there?"

"Why, Joe," she stammered. "I thought it was Loueezy you was after now."

"Whatever put that notion into your head? Haven't I been waiting for you for ten years? I told you then I'd never marry any other girl. Why, Loueezy knew I was courting you. She gave me that hint about you wanting an automobile, last fall, on purpose to help me out."

"Oh, Joe," she disclaimed. "I never thought of such a thing. I never cared much about autos anyway,—leastways, not till tonight," she added honestly.

"Don't you love me, Mandy?" he asked wistfully, smoothing one of her sleeves with his big, clumsy hands.

"Yes, I do, Joe. I always have, I guess, but I can't see my way clear yet to leaving pa and the boys with Loueezy. She don't know the first thing about keeping house."

"Time she learned, then, and the only way she will ever learn is by having to do it. Let her try it. It will do her good."

"I can't, Joe. She is so easy-going. Why, she said just the other day that she would let the boys sleep under wet quilts before she would carry them out. You know the roof has leaked for quite a spell," she added apologetically.

"Yes, and she would, too, and it would serve them right. They need somebody like her to deal with them. Besides, I haven't got any one to look after me. Don't I need tending?" he asked, trying to put a plaintive note into his voice. "Land! If you could see the shape my things is getting into over there," he exaggerated.

"Bring over your mending, Joe, and I'll be glad to do it for you," she offered eagerly.

"'Tain't mendin' I want, Mandy, it's you."

"I can't," she cried desperately. "Leastways not until Loueezy learns how to do something besides crochet."

He was angry now. "This is the last time I'll ask you, Mandy," he warned. "Will you go?"

She shook her head, the lump in her throat forbidding speech, her face pale and beseeching.

"All right. I'm done with coaxing. Good night." He turned, jumped into the car and was gone. Mandy stood looking after him, rigid with despair. As she turned back to the little unpainted, ramshackle cabin, set in a bare expanse of ground, her heart failed her. She raged inwardly at herself. She had hoped against hope for ten years that Joe would return some day and ask the very question that he had asked her tonight. She had determined many times that if that time ever came she would go with him gladly, but in the crisis the same duty that had reared its head between them ten years before had again parted them. In her heart she knew that Louise, through selfishness and indolence, was no more capable of taking care of the men folks than she had been when a child. Would she ever be? Mandy wondered guiltily whether she had made a mistake. Did she owe a duty to Joe? He had no one but her. As she meditated, she decided that she had made a mistake. "It's too late," she mourned, "for when Joe says anything, he always keeps his word. He'll never ask me again, and I don't blame him a mite."

That night it rained. Not a gentle little shower, but a cold, pelting, driving rain that penetrated every crack and crevice. It poured through the leaky roof of the cabin like a deluge. Mandy climbed over the prostrate form of the gently-snoring Louise, and proceeded to close the windows. Then she climbed the ladder to the loft, carrying dishpans and pails to set under the worst places, added more quilts to her brothers' beds to keep them dry, and then, damp and cold herself, crept back into bed again. Her very soul revolted at the thought of doing this for the rest of her life.

The next morning after the boys had eaten a late breakfast and dawdled drowsily off to their work, Louise still being asleep, Mandy carried out all the heavy quilts again to dry in the sunshine. Her heart ached, and her eyes were heavy with unshed tears. She was so occupied in her own misery that she failed to see a little red automobile come tearing down the road from the west. Suddenly a shadow fell across the quilt she was tugging straight on the line.

"Doing the same old stunt, hey?" Joe's voice boomed. "Just what I expected. Now you look here." She looked. He was very big and determined. "You go into the house and pack whatever belongs to you,—your clothes and that quilt with the thousand pieces. Put on your hat and hurry."

Her long-practiced habit of meekness stood her in good stead. She scurried into the house like a frightened rabbit, and soon reappeared in her best dress and hat. A grey canvas valise held all her belongings. He tucked it into the back of the car. Any thought of neglected duties were forgotten in the overwhelming desire to go for another delicious ride in this car, at Joe's side.

At last, Lochinvar had come out of the west and had stolen his bride, who was, like that other bride, a very willing captive. They were married an hour later in the village parsonage. The minister's wife and the salesman from whom Joe had purchased the automobile were witnesses. Just as the knot was safely tied, back in the little unpainted cabin, behind the turkey-red print drape, Louise turned over in bed, yawned sleepily, and stretched her white arms above her head. Then she snuggled down and slept again.

from the floor and the rest is screened in. It has canvas doors that are hinged at the top and which can be drawn to the ceiling by a cord. The drop-door of the cellar is in part of the floor. The built-in sink has a door so I can still wash my dishes in the sink. A cistern pump has been replaced by faucets. I have an oil stove, cabinet, cupboard and dining table in this room. The floor is covered with linoleum. I can cook and work in comfort and we eat there and enjoy the cool breezes from three sides. As farmers can seldom have a vacation in summer-time, we pretend we are on an outing at "Joy Cottage" in the pines, in this cool little room. Everyone that comes to our home in hot weather praises the summer porch. The little south porch is also screened in and made into a sleeping porch. We had a built-in cupboard put in the partition between the kitchen and dining-room, with doors opening into both rooms. This is a great labor saver. Also made a small south room into a bathroom. All these conveniences could be put in by the "handy man around the house" with but little expense.

To those having a special friend or chum who doesn't write as often as you wish, set the pace by writing every so often, and request them to bargain to do the same. Make the penalty for failure to write, an extra letter between times. Try putting personality into your letters to hold their interest.

If I could have your address, Udeyne of Tennessee you would get a letter from me. How may I obtain it? Somehow you have struck the right chord in my heart.

My husband is an orphan. He was born at Pomeroy, Washington, the son of John Dallas. He had two older sisters named Anna and Theresa, also an uncle named Lester Dallas. He is very anxious to get in communication with any of his relatives.

I would be glad to hear from any of the COMFORT sisters who care to write.

The three mottoes I try to live up to are: Not to worry over little things. To make the best of things as they come and to keep young. By following these I find more sunshine about me and that life is not as hard as it seems to be.

There is so much I would like to say but my letter is getting too long I fear, for I have the habit of writing long letters. If I am welcomed later I will tell you about the state of Idaho which is rightly called "The Gem of the Mountains." I lived there seventeen years.

With love to each of you,

ERMA (LITTLE) DALLAS.

WEST UNION, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

I have taken COMFORT for many years and derive much good from the letters. I am young and need good advice, as I am the mother of two sweet babies, Josephine, two and one half years, and Vernon, one year old.

I have a good husband and am very happy. We live on a farm on the Wabash River. I raise chickens and care for a garden and have a two-story house to keep clean so you see I have plenty to do.

Perhaps some of the sisters remember seeing a letter from Stella M. Baker or Mrs. Mitchell Baker in COMFORT a few years ago. She is my sister and one of the best sisters in the world. She is always doing good somewhere.

Nelle, I enjoy your letters very, very much and also Mrs. Vesey's. I love to travel. Two years ago we took a trip to Montana and stayed a year.

Mrs. Wheeler, I am young to advise you on the subject you asked about but I think it would be better to tell the children when they are old enough to understand, that they are adopted for they are sure to find it out from someone else and you are the one to tell it to them in the best way.

MRS. ORAS CHENOWETH.

GEORGIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I would like very much to join this delightful corner if I may.

Auntie Wood and Mrs. I. G. Auld, your letters were greatly enjoyed.

S. C. Sheppard, please write again and tell us more about the north wood.

When one is feeling tired nothing is more restful than to read the letters in this corner so it might be said justly that "reading each day keeps the doctor away." Physical exercise is refreshing but reading, particularly when it is habitual, lets the mind and spirit out of the individual for a complete holiday from self. Anybody who tries it consistently knows that it is possible to pick up a book at a time of vexed tensity and enjoy that almost inexplicable magic which results in a calm and poised self. Newspapers do not give this calm. A good book or magazine compelling interest in the lives of individuals of another time and place are better for the nerves than reading about the places in which we have found confusion during the day. I suppose the reason I enjoy reading more than any other thing is because of my affliction. I am growing deaf. General conversation bothers me; although by being very attentive I can usually understand what people say to me if they do not speak too softly. Some people I know yell at me in a very loud tone of voice and cause me to be the object of all eyes, while others talk so low I have to ask them to please speak loudly. I do not blame my friends and acquaintances for the manner in which they speak to me but if I avoid people is it to be wondered? I am twenty-three years old and realize that I am abnormally sensitive, self-conscious and seclusive. No doubt I should control my feelings better and show more courage. I admit all this but sometimes I feel so humiliated and really mortified. In fact, it makes me just plain unhappy. But I am going to keep cheerful so the family will never know how it hurts.

Best wishes to all.

FRANCES.

PENELOPE, R. R. 1, Box 43, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT two years. I enjoy the letters and stories and my only regret is that it doesn't come twice a month.

I am twenty-five years old and have been married nearly seven years and am the mother of three children, two of whom are living and one dear little one gone on. She was the dearest and brightest but she stayed with us only a little while, being four months old when God took her away. Her bright smile will remain with us forever. I think no home is happy without children and our small son of five and our little girl aged two are our pride and joy. It is our aim in life to have healthy, happy children. My husband and I both are deaf but not mute for we can both talk some but we have been deaf since childhood. I lost my hearing when ten years of age, becoming deaf in twenty-four hours from paralyzed nerves and though I have seen many of the best doctors all say I will never hear again. But because we are deaf does not interfere with our work and our children are bright and smart. They can hear and talk as well as anyone. We talk by means of the deaf-and-dumb signs, using our fingers and hands.

We live on a farm of one hundred acres of good land which we are paying for and hope to call it ours before many years. We own our stock and the necessary farming tools and we also have a Ford car which we got new last spring. So you see we are about as well off as the majority. Some people think we are strange because we are deaf and when we go to town they stand around and stare at us and many laugh when we talk on our fingers.

We live about thirty miles from the city of Waco where there are quite a few deaf people; they have a Sunday School class for them at the Baptist church. We often go there in summer but in the winter the roads are not good enough and we cannot go as often as we would like, but we go whenever we can and enjoy ourselves, talking with other deaf people. We have many friends there.

I lived in the city until I was married. I love my home and keep it clean and cheerful and we are happy. I raise chickens and tend the garden and try in every way to help my husband save and pay for our little home and how happy we shall be when the last note is paid and we are free from debt.

I would like to get letters from any of the sisters who care to write.

With love and best wishes to you all,

MRS. ROY BOWMAN.

Mrs. Bowman and Frances.—Have either of you tried lip reading? I have been told that it isn't so very difficult to learn. There are well-written books on the subject for those who are unable to attend a lip-reading school or have a private teacher. I'll look the matter up more fully if you wish me to. And to those who are prone to shout at deaf people, just remember that a clear, distinct voice of medium tone carries better than a voice pitched unnaturally high. —Ed.

ST. JOSEPH, Sta. A, Box 64, MO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I did not intend to make it a habit of calling on you and usurping the place of some sister who has a right here, but so many of you have written me and extended such cordial invitations to call again that I decided to brave the editor's frowns and make you another visit. I wish to thank all the sisters who have written me for their kindly expressed appreciation of my letter and am very glad there are so many suffragettes. Since I visited you before you have been

Come Back to Your Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

The Cloud is Due to Film

When pearly teeth grow dingy they are coated with a film.

There is on all teeth a slimy film, ever-present, ever-forming. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

Brushing in the usual way does not end this film. That is why so many teeth discolor and decay. Most tooth troubles are now traced to film.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Now We Combat It

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat this film. Able authorities have proved this by many careful tests. Leading dentists all over America are now urging its adoption.

For home use the method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And all who ask are sent a ten-day test to show them what it does.

Based on Pepsin

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

A recent discovery makes this method possible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has now found a harmless activating method. Now active pepsin can be constantly applied.

Pepsodent is now doing for millions of teeth what nothing else has done. We urge you to see what it does for your teeth. Compare it with the old-time methods and judge the results for yourself.

The test is free. Make it for your sake and your children's sake. Cut out the coupon now.

What Is Your Best Expression?

I USED to know a pretty girl who was lovely to look at so long as she smiled with her eyes, but the moment she was moved to real mirth, her lips drew up over her gums and her attractiveness was gone. Nobody had the courage to tell her that her broad smile was unpleasing; yet it should have been a simple matter for her to discover this for herself.

What could she have done, even so? Learned to regulate her smiles. One can look pleased, amused, interested, joyous, just by an expression of the eyes and a lifting of the corners of the mouth. We are often moved quite deeply by some pathetic story we hear or a play we see, as a rule.

A smile with parted lips is lovely if the teeth it discloses are even and white, but why part the lips if they are inclined to draw back and disclose the gums? Your feelings are as easily expressed by lips curved with amusement or pleasure but not parted.

One of the earliest lessons we all need to learn is that we are paying the world the very best compliment possible if we try always to let it see us in our pleasantest aspect. There is nothing artificial or vain about this; it is really the duty of every woman, every man, and every child to make themselves as pleasing to the rest of the world as possible. If I had a small daughter and she had an unpleasing way of pursing her lips, I shouldn't hesitate a minute about telling her that she didn't make a pretty picture when she used that expression, and that the feeling she had in her mind behind that pursing of the lips ought to find a pleasanter way to express itself. Children think it all a beautiful game, when it is brought to them in this fashion; they do not become self-conscious or vain; they laugh about it, and are curious to see how the face can be made to express one thing in different ways, and then quite unconsciously they finally adopt the better way.

Why shouldn't we older people be as easily adaptable? Let's try it! For each emotion you have to find utterance for, which is the best expression? It's lots of fun, studying it out—try it!

DON'T OPEN THE LIPS IN SMILING IF THE TEETH ARE NOT PRETTY.

but we have learned to school our feelings in public. We do not sob or groan or do any of the things which sadness might reasonably be supposed to indulge in. We know the public does not want to be disturbed by our private emotions. It isn't a bit harder, girls, to control the happier feelings which seek their expression in smiles and laughter. Laugh, by all means, but train yourself to do it pleasingly. A low, soft laugh is lovely to listen to, and the mouth from which it comes is usually as lovely in its curves. A loud and boisterous laugh or a giggle are neither pleasing to the ear nor to the eye,

Answers to Questions

GEORGIA.—To make your eyelashes grow, anoint the edges of the lids very gently each night with a little warm olive oil. Never brush or pick the lashes, and never rub the eyes. Wash the eyes gently each morning, but do not rub them open as so many people do, because that is one way of rubbing out your lashes and I am sure you do not want to do that. Of course you apply the oil to the lids with either the finger-tip or a tiny camel's-hair brush like the tiniest paint brush. The brush is better than the finger. To get rid of blackheads, first keep the face clean. To do that, wash it each night, before retiring, in hot soapy water, but do not rub soap on the face ever. Use a soft cloth and cleanse every portion of the face. Then rinse in warm water, then in cool, finally in cold water. In the morning, wash in tepid water without soap, and do this whenever in the course of the day the face needs freshening. Blackheads are clogged pores, so keep yours fresh and active. If you will invest in a camel's-hair face complexion brush—which is just like a hand brush only of soft hair—and brush your hair for the first few nights, on retiring, using the hot soapy water, after that the brush will not be necessary, for your blackheads will probably all have disappeared. Remember you must keep the pores active, and poorly selected foods make pores sluggish, so eat sensible foods, including plenty of vegetables and fruits, and drink lots of water. For freckles, if they are of the summer kind, they aren't worth bothering with, but if they are friends of long standing, then you might try this remedy, always remembering that the only way to remove freckles is to remove the skin, and that when you have done this the new skin is very sensitive and easily irrritated, besides being unable to stand the sun's heat without freckling worse than ever. So if you remove freckles, be very tender of the skin which takes their place, wear broad-brimmed hats and veils, and use cold cream well rubbed in before going out into the air. As a matter of fact, it is quite possible that a good course of soap and water scrubbing at night, no soap in the daytime but cold cream applied, rubbed in, wiped off, then a little powder dusted on the surface before going outdoors, might put your skin in better condition at once and your freckles might fade away through receiving no encouragement to remain.

To Remove Obstinate Freckles

Lactic acid, two ounces; glycerine, one ounce; rose-water, one half ounce.

Apply only to the freckles and let dry on, doing this every night for two or three nights or until the skin begins to peel. After that, rub in a little cold cream.

MARGARET.—See answer to "Blue Eyes" in last month's department.

WORRIED GIRL.—What you have done won't do any harm at all or have the result you speak of. Only don't do it again, because it is better to let things remain as they are. It isn't anything to get rid of. All people are alike in this respect, and it is just as natural as noses on faces. So forget it and don't do it again, even though it isn't the least harm in the world. To get fat, my dear (answering your next question), eat the kind of foods that make fat—boiled or baked potatoes, boiled rice, macaroni, white bread and butter (but not hot breads), gravy, milk, cream. Don't eat fried foods if you can help it. Of course where other people plan the meals it isn't always easy to eat just the things one wants, but one can use a little judgment and not eat heartily of things not particularly good for one. If you could eat a soft-boiled egg for breakfast, and some oatmeal and cream or milk, and some stewed prunes or a baked or raw apple, or an orange or some grapefruit, with either buttered toast or bread and butter, you would have a good breakfast. But your family may have ham and potatoes

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.—Advt.

SMILE LIKE THIS IF YOUR MOUTH IS LOVELY.

Hair Often Ruined By Careless Washing

Soap should be used very carefully, if you want to keep your hair looking its best. Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali. This dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle, and ruins it.

The best thing for steady use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo (which is pure and greaseless), and is better than anything else you can use.

One or two teaspoonfuls will cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly. Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excessive oil. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and it leaves the scalp soft, and the hair fine and silky, bright, lustrous, fluffy and easy to manage.

You can get Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo at any drug store, it's very cheap, and a few ounces will supply every member of the family for months.

You can get rid of itching with Resinol

Resinol Ointment and Resinol Soap easily heal most cases of eczema and similar skin-eruptions. The first application usually stops the itching and burning instantly. Sold by all druggists. For sample of each free, write to Dept. 3-T, Resinol, Baltimore, Md. Use Resinol Soap for the complexion.

Use MURINE FOR YOUR EYES Night and Morning. Have Clean, Healthy Eyes. If they Tire, Itch, Smart or Burn, if Sore, Irritated, Inflamed or Granulated, use Murine often. Soothes, Refreshes. Safe for Infant or Adult. At all Druggists. Write for Free Eye Book. Murine Eye Remedy Co., Chicago

Freckles

Tan or Liver Spots positively removed by using Stillman's Freckle Cream. Prepared for one purpose only—clearing the skin. If you have freckles, write us today for our Free Booklet "Wouldst Thou Be Fair?" Stillman's Cream is sold by most druggists, 50c a jar, or direct from us, same price, prepaid. American Housewife's Mistake

By A. M. Hughes, M. D.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE American housewife's mistake is a false modesty in the matter of refusing to take the proper amount of rest, during her monthly functions, that amounts to downright prudery. She fears someone will know why she is resting.

Why should she fear it? Nothing could be more absurd. It is a part of her God-given womanhood, as natural to woman as appetite. She should be proud of it, proud that it means she is qualified to take that all-important part in Nature's great plan of the chain of life. In no other country in the world are the women prudish about this, and in every other country in the world the women are healthier and stronger than in America.

The American housewife's mistake in being so prudish in this matter that she will slave during those few days when she should rest is that it destroys her health, her happiness, and, as I will show later, frequently her home. That is her mistake, and it is one of the gravest. Every person knows full well that these periods of illness are all a natural part of a woman's life and it is utter foolishness and false modesty to refrain from admitting it. In Europe every woman takes her rest. Nothing more is thought of that by the others in the home than would be if mother remained in bed some morning with a severe headache. The European housewife, when this time arrives, gives up all her household duties, if it is possible, if not she does no more than make the beds and prepare simple meals. No washing is done, no sewing, no sweeping, nothing but the very simplest duties are performed, and in consequence she has all but a few hours of each day to rest.

"Mother is ill," is the simple statement. No more is thought of it. It is natural that she should be ill. It is natural to those people that mother should rest.

But here in America? Horrors! Breathe it not! Mother will slave, she will sweep and wash and scrub and dust just as though she were quite in her usual good health, for if not someone might ask why.

The reasons why the American housewife should rest at these times are, or should be, generally understood. First, the blood pressure is greatly increased, then it is greatly lowered. Her vitality is extremely low and there is a mental effect. All this reacts on her nerves and her nerves react on her brain. She becomes fretful, cross, unreasonable, morbid and unhappy. Her head aches, her back aches, her limbs ache. What she needs is perfect rest for a few days. Nothing else in the world will serve except rest.

Not every woman has all these troubles, but many do, and every woman has the increased blood pressure and then the low vitality, and nearly every woman has some aches and pains. She is in no condition to stand over a hot stove and bake, or roast meats. She is in no condition to push a carpet-sweeper about or wield a broom, or to work the pedals of a sewing machine. This work adds to her troubles.

Many a home has been wrecked because of this disregard or ignorance of Nature's demands. The husband fails to understand why his wife should be cross with him. "Why the grouch?" he asks. "Now what have I done?" This makes her nerves jump, her head ache more and her mind becomes a little out of the normal. But will she tell him why? Not in nine cases out of ten. Perhaps she does not fully understand herself.

"Nothing is the matter, it is you who are cross," will come the rejoinder. She is not responsible for this temperament at this time, but she is responsible for being so prudish that she won't admit she is a normal, God-made woman who, at certain periods, needs rest and quiet. Just why she won't admit this is beyond the knowledge of anyone, except that she has been educated through many generations to believe that it is immodest to admit such things, to even mention them. The American woman seems to want to go along giving the impression that she is a sort of dainty, immortal, angel-like creature. But she isn't. She would be miserable if she were. No man would love her. Man wants a very human woman. Over in Europe and in other countries this is all understood, and the women can out-run, out-walk, out-work our women.

False training of the daughters, false modesty, fear to let your own people know that you are a normal woman, has made thousands of chronic invalids in this country. Women have done washing when they should have been in an easy-chair reading; women have swept floors when they should have been flat on their backs on a couch or in bed. The result has been broken-down health, invalidism, no pleasure in the home, no hopes for the future, and possibly a separation.

This is not limited to the housewife who works. The women who do not need to do the housework, who have competent maids, are prone to this harmful prudishness. They will run downtown shopping, they will go here or there, keep an engagement rather than ask to be excused on the ground of temporary illness. The result is a depressed, irritable wife, a husband who doesn't understand, and all sorts of trouble.

Even the savage, unlettered, uncivilized women of Africa know better than to work during these times. They rest in their huts and the savage men are not so savage but what they know why, nor so savage but what they are quite willing. When normal, these savage women work like the men—generally ten times harder. The average American housewife lacks, in this matter, the wisdom of those barbarian women of the jungles.

We speak of the red-faced, clear-eyed English women. They are fond of outdoor life, they are sturdy and they love to walk. There are ten American invalid women to one English invalid woman, because your English cousins know of the necessity of rest at certain times for their women and they see to it that the rest is taken.

Every operatic impressario can tell you that their foreign singers have this wisdom, that they never make this mistake. We marvel at the vigor, and the beauty of these foreign opera singers, they seem to keep young for years longer than our native women. These singers have a clause in their contracts which permits them to rest each month when the normal woman needs rest. They realize that they cannot retain their strength and health if they attempt to sing in public when they are ill, and they are wise enough to so arrange their contracts that they do not have to do this. How many times do we read that "Mme. So-and-So did not appear in Carmen (or whatever the opera was) last night, owing to a slight throat trouble, and the role was taken by Mme. La Blank"? It frequently appears in print, and most of us believe it was throat trouble; we are not wise enough to understand these things. Abroad it is different. The papers make the simple statement, "Mme. So-and-So was unable to appear." That was all. Everyone understands. No one is shocked. No one has any right to be shocked.

American housewives have a routine for their work. Especially is this true in New England and the Eastern States, although nearly every housewife has some sort of a routine. That is, washing on Monday, ironing on Tuesday, sweeping on Wednesday, baking on Friday, sewing on Saturday, and so on. There is no harm in this. The harm comes in the absolutely senseless manner in which so many women rigidly follow this routine. It doesn't matter if their heads are splitting, if their backs are aching and they feel scarcely able to stand, they have an insane belief that the washing has got to be done on Monday and the ironing has got to be done on Tuesday. And they do it and before many years they are broken in health.

They have not got to do these things on specified days. There will be plenty of days for washing as long as there are clothes and people to wear them. There have been plenty of days for washing ever since "Adam delved and Eve span." And this reminds me that in your Bible you will find mention of this very thing—rules laid down for the care of women during these functions. The wise old men of the Bible times knew all about these things and they understood the value of a healthy woman and the need of keeping that woman in health.

What if the children do have soiled frocks? It won't hurt them to go a few days longer in them? What if there is a little dust on the floors? It won't hurt you to leave it there a couple more days. What if the soiled linen is still in the hamper? Leave it there. It will be just as serviceable if it isn't washed until next week. Sewing to do? Let it rest. One of the worst things a woman who is ill can do is to pump a sewing machine treadle up and down for even half an hour.

All this is the first great mistake so many of our women make. The next great mistake they make is in failing to tell their daughters about these things. I do not mean the story of sex because most mothers have grown wise and are doing this, but they fail to warn their daughters about the mistake of false modesty in the matter. The girls should be educated to rest, to realize that it is not only their right to take this rest, but their duty. It is a duty they owe to their husbands and to the children every normal girl hopes to bring into the world.

Furthermore, educate the sons. When your son is about to be married, impress upon him the necessity of demanding that his wife take this rest. Explain the need of it. Urge him to teach her that she should not work at these times and that the fear some one might know why she is resting is the worst sort of false modesty and prudishness.

It means happier and healthier mothers, it means contented grandmothers and it means stronger and healthier generations to come. It is hygienically necessary. We have always known that woman, at least the average woman, is slightly abnormal, mentally, during these times. We have known in a general way that they were by no means feeling well, but we have gone blindly ahead and refused to see the necessity of making life easier for the women. And the women have been equally blind. The rest is theirs for the asking. All they need to do in practically every case is to give up hard work for a few days and rest. No man fit to be called a man would object. The trouble has been that it is the woman's mistake, she has neglected to do this, and the absurdity of it all is that it has been through a sort of prudishness and pitiful false modesty.

What does a husband care if his house is a bit dusty and untidy for a few days, so long as his wife is storing up health and strength? He had rather see a house full of dust and disorder than see a disordered, nervous, irritable wife.

Many women can stand all this. But many cannot. To some it means a general breakdown, to others such a nervous breakdown as to verge on insanity. And who knows how many suicides have been caused because the woman has broken her health with unnecessary drudgery at these times? With this sort of necessary rest the housewife gains in health, and with health housework loses its drudgery. The time will come when the American housewife will no longer be so prudish in this matter but, like her wise foreign sisters, take the rest she needs at the time she needs it and thereby make her life worth living.

How Our Milk Is Used

Estimates made by the United States Department of Agriculture show how the 87,905,000,000 pounds of milk produced in the United States annually are utilized. Forty-four and one half per cent is used as fresh milk for human food purposes, while 36 per cent of the gross supply is converted into butter, and 4.5 per cent is made into cheese; another 4.5 per cent is transformed into canned milk, 4 per cent is used in ice cream making, 4 per cent is used in feeding calves and hogs on the farms of origin, and 2.5 per cent is lost in shrinkage and other waste of the dairying industry.

of Violet's disappearance, but a little later he read just a paragraph referring to the "mysterious disappearance of Miss Huntington," and calling attention to the fact that as yet nothing had been learned regarding her.

He showed this to Lord Cameron, but that gentleman, wishing to spare Wallace a renewal of the old grief, made some indifferent reply, and the subject was dropped.

Preparations went steadily on for the young earl's marriage with Miss Humphrey. He had written to his mother regarding his engagement and begged that she would come to New York to be present at his wedding.

She responded with delighted congratulations and stated that she would be with him within a month, for she wished to make the acquaintance of his bride-elect as soon as possible.

She had been greatly pleased with Agnes' picture and his lordship's description of her, and she was very happy to know that Vane's life would, after all, be complete—that the grand old home in Essex would not be desolate, after she was gone, for the want of a mistress; while, too, she was delighted upon her own account, for her heart had long yearned for the companionship of a daughter.

Taking the Blue Out of Monday

By Leslie Gordon

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE chief reason why the weekly washing day used to be called "Blue Monday" was because our forebears made a very hard job of what today is comparatively easy, if the laundry is properly equipped. Now whether you do your own washing or are fortunate enough to keep a servant who will consent to do it, or are financially able to employ a laundress, you have everything to gain by making the work as light as possible so it will neither tax your own strength unduly nor oblige your washerwoman to spend a great deal of her highly paid time at the task. It is well to remember nowadays that in the long run machinery is much cheaper than labor; so if you have a large family by all means invest in a good washing machine. Such machines are very helpful for heavy clothes, and where large washings are the rule.

Many washing machines are wood-lined, have a kneading motion and are worked by a lever or crank. Others have an inverted cone, worked by a lever, which presses down into the wet clothes and sucks the dirt up. The machine must be kept clean, free from dust and rust, and out of the weather.

Of course every laundry or kitchen where washing is done is equipped with some sort of a wringer, for this saves not only time but the clothes themselves. A good wringer lasts for years if properly taken care of. Always clean and dry it after using. A little kerosene will brighten the rubber when it becomes dull or stained, but remember that kerosene cleans by eating off a thin layer of rubber every time it is used. Oil the wringer occasionally, and, when not in use, leave the screws loose that the rolls may not become flat. Cover the wringer with a cloth to keep it clean when not in use.

The boiler may be round or oblong, stationary or portable, but should be very largely of copper, not only for the sake of greater durability but also because copper transmits heat more readily than almost any other metal.

A clothes-stick may be made of an old broomstick or can be bought with a metal-pronged end. Stationary tubs are the best, but if you do not have them you can get very serviceable portable tubs made of fibre, galvanized iron, enamel or wood.

It is a great labor saver to have the washbench the easiest height for the user. Thirty-six inches or less from the top of the tub to the floor is about right for the average woman.

Very few housewives know the value of an ordinary whisk brush for sprinkling clothes. Try it and see what a time saver it is.

Irons must be kept perfectly clean to give the best and quickest service. How many women there are who do not take this small precaution which saves both time and temper and smudged clothes. New irons should always be put on the stove and allowed to get heated thoroughly and then well rubbed with wax before using. Irons that are often used should be frequently scraped clean of starch, even perhaps rubbed over fine salt or washed in soap and water and dried. A plentiful use of wax is another important requirement, though care must be taken that this is wiped off with cloth or paper before it touches the cloth. The irons with the detachable handle are the best, for they save the use and fuss of an iron holder, but they do not make the clothes any smoother than an old-fashioned iron. Of course the ideal work-saving iron is the electric, for the heat of it does not vary and it can be used continually without the delay and fatigue of trips back and forth to the stove. For the house not electrically connected, there are gas irons that do the work in the same way, and for country houses and bungalows there are irons with a small iron attachment to hold the kerosene that heats the irons without heating the house at the same time.

Make a cover of denim or calico or any stout material into which the ironing board can be slipped when not in use. This will keep the white cover clean much longer than if it is left exposed to the dust by standing uncovered in the corner of the laundry or kitchen between washings. The real labor-saver never uses old sheets for ironing-board covers as is the custom in most households, because she knows that they will quickly tear or fall away in holes. Strong muslin is none too good for the ironing-board and is the most inexpensive in the end. If this material is bought double width (seventy-two inches), only three quarters of a yard is required if the width is used for the length of the board, and it wears a very long time when a little care is taken not to burn it. There is an attachment that can be bought very cheaply that will quickly adjust any cover on an ironing-board. It consists simply of a set of strong steel hooks and a bit of firm cord. One end, of each of these hooks, is bent so that it can be secured strongly to the cover after being inserted. When all the hooks are in place along the four sides of the cover, all that is needed is to lace them up criss-cross, like a shoe, and the cover is stretched smooth and flat.

A great deal of time and trouble is saved in starching if the starch is exactly right and does not stick on the iron. The following recipe comes from a laundry noted for its fine work.

When ready to make starch, mix one and one half teaspoonfuls of starch with one half cup of cold water into a perfectly smooth paste, then add one half teaspoonful borax and one fourth teaspoonful of paraffin or two or three drops of lard. Now add, stirring constantly, one quart of boiling water just at the boiling point for twenty minutes. Strain. Follow this method and the starch will be all that your heart could desire. For gingham or percale dresses, dilute each cup of cooked starch with two cups of water and the stiffness will be just right. Shake well and hang in the shade to dry as the sun will quickly affect the color.

Dampen only a short time before ironing, folding the garments closely and spatting well between the hands to insure even spreading of the moisture. Wrap each garment separately if the colors are at all apt to run.

When ironing colored fabrics be careful not to use too hot an iron, yet it must be hot enough to smooth without blistering or sticking. A very hot iron, however, will ruin the color sooner than fifty washings. Many garments may be ironed to an advantage on the wrong side.

given the ballot and I am glad to know that the long fight is over and we have won. God has seen fit to give you the ballot at a time when your country needs your support and the eyes of the world are on you,—the result of next year's election is awaited with breathless expectancy. I am sure you will go to the polls and conduct yourselves as intelligent, honest, womanly women and cast your first vote for the better government. The most important danger you must guard against, sisters, is allowing yourselves to be influenced by your husbands, brothers or other masculine members of your household. Study the political situation yourselves and decide for yourselves how you want to vote. Do not let them convince you that they are more capable of advising you than women politicians. Think, study, plan, ask questions, attend political meetings. You have said you were as capable of voting as the men, now prove it. If you vote the way your husband does—because he does—then you are not capable of voting and our long, bitter fight for you has been in vain. We need your aid to elect men to office who will see that the law is enforced. There is a great responsibility resting on you, sisters, but I know you can be trusted to make this a better world to live in.

I want to say to you girls who have written me for advice and asked me to answer through COMFORT, that you ask for something that is not mine to give. So Sweet Sixteen, Orphan, Just a Girl, Anxious, Broken-hearted and many others, please remember that I am not the editor and have not the authority to command space in COMFORT to answer your inquiries. Would be glad to advise you and if you want me to and think my advice worth two cents, write me, enclosing a stamp and I will give you the advantage of my experience. Of course each of you thought no one else would ask for advice but many have and I cannot answer you through the paper.

Miss Pert from 'way down on the Oucilla River, why didn't you sign your name? I won't let the old maids hurt you so write me again. I liked your letter.

B of Goshen, received your letter. I would like to debate the marriage question with you but fear it would occupy too much space and a personal debate would give no one else the benefit of our arguments; also I am very susceptible and have no desire to be No. 18.

Rosie Lawless, if you are really wondering why I have never married I will send you my photograph and that will answer you most effectively.

Criss, if I were you I would move to some other part of the country if you have such silly men as you say down there. No man, with an ounce of brains, is going to think a girl is in love with him just because she gives him a cheerful smile and a friendly greeting.

Now by-by sisters. Don't ask me to call again because it isn't right. This is the Sisters' Corner and our editor says there isn't space to print all the letters she receives from you so if she prints mine it takes the space that otherwise would be given to some sister. So I will bid you farewell with many thanks for your kindness. GEORGE L. GARRISON.

INDIANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

COMFORT came this month, a veritable budget of comfort. My mother took it when I was just a little girl and we girls used to quarrel over it to see who should have it first. I've read so many good letters in it that I feel I must add my mite of help also.

We have been married twelve years and have moved several times. Our furniture was good but marred and scratched awfully so I brushed every piece of it with lye using an old brush for the purpose. This cut the varnish off, then I took clean water and a cloth and washed the article clean. I let it dry in the sun and then sandpapered it thoroughly. Then I applied one coat of light oak stain, though any stain could be used, and after it was well dried I put on a coat of good varnish and had some furniture that looked like new. My white iron beds were scarred so I got ivory enamel and applied two coats to each bed, touching the ornaments with bronze. They look like new.

Our house was in an awful condition when we moved here. The floors were hardwood. We filled the cracks with cement and dryer mixed. When dry, we sandpapered it and applied one coat of yellow filler. After this dried we put on a coat of light oak graining color, then a coat of varnish. We put oatmeal paper on the walls downstairs and upstairs used Muresco. I use small rugs on the floors. The cost for all this was small compared with the results.

Where we needed wardrobes we put up a shelf with hooks underneath and hung curtains around it.

We live on a farm. I milk three and four cows, keep one hundred and twenty-five hens. I sold one hundred dollars' worth of chickens. I enjoy farm life although the work is hard.

I will close with a pen picture of myself. Am five feet, five inches tall, with blue eyes and brown curly hair and just pleasingly plump.

Pearl Vesey, I would like to know you. Your letters are so full of the joy of living.

Some time I'll tell of the community fair we held at the schoolhouse. E. M. M.

KENTUCKY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you permit me to answer Milly's letter through your columns?

Milly I think I understand your case for two years ago I was in the "rut" myself. Like you, I was neither pretty nor ugly but I was bashful and silly. The first thing I did was to set to work to make myself more attractive. I was skinny with a freckled, rough, swarthy skin. I followed Katherine Booth's suggestions very closely and gained pounds and pounds until I had a figure.

Like you I had a sister who was a universal pet but unlike you I was jealous of her.

Then I watched my complexion very closely and by following the same suggestions had a beautiful clear skin in three months. The personal care you give your appearance goes a long way toward making and keeping friends. An elderly neighbor gave me my cue, "Just feel that you look as well as any one and have as good a right there." Forget yourself in this fight; think of the comfort and happiness of others and gradually friends will come. Go with your sister more and try treating her once or twice as she has treated you. Start a pen friendship with some of COMFORT'S sisters and cousins. They are willing to be your friends I am sure. Keep yourself attractive as possible; even in a bungalow apron one can be attractive if they really and truly try.

You must surely have talked to a boy five minutes in your life. But that is better than being a flirt. Just remember that men are human and are not going to eat you and talk to them. There is no reason in the world why a seemingly intelligent girl your age should not have friends. It isn't silly to want young friends but just natural.

Now dear I will leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson and there is more I'd like to tell you if you would write to me. Your letters will be held in confidence.

I haven't power to say whether you are held to your promise but I don't believe you are for God is a just God and I believe wants His children to be happy. I hope to hear from you. HAPPY NOW.

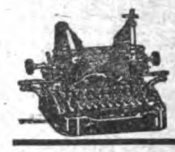
Happy Now and Others.—Last month I sent several personal letters to Milly to the address she gave but they were returned marked "Unknown." They are being kept for her in case she wishes to send her real name; if she doesn't she is the only loser.—Ed.

KIMBALL, S. DAK.

HELLO HOMEFOLKS:

I've been camping "in" instead of out for ever so long and cooking half-forgotten goodies on a six-hole range instead of over a camp fire. I didn't get a bit tired of outdoor life; in fact, I'd like to drive from coast to coast were it not for going without a garden, and I found that one may have a "home" in the true sense of the word, even where there is no house.

I promised to tell you about the sights we saw along the way. While near Alpena, S. Dak., we saw a cyclone—funnel shaped and inky black—sweep away to the east of us and our first three days in this state were spent in the shelter of a treeclaim grove. It gave me a chance to mend and the time passed quickly.



Only once did we bump our noses. One night we came to a spring about a rod from the road. There were trees around it and it showed evidence of having been an old camping ground. Being tired we were glad to eat a hearty supper and retire. Just as the kiddies were washing some very brown toes, along came a little old man wearing a fierce frown and scrubby whiskers. He loudly ordered us to begone and wouldn't listen to us at all. We drove many miles before we found a place wide enough to camp on. About midnight we saw a light and upon investigation found a farm woman who was sitting up for a belated husband. She gave us permission to camp on an unused field road. Just as we were nicely settled, her husband and another man came down there and surlily asked Mr. V. several very sharp questions and marched home again. I soon fell asleep but Mr. V. stayed up till morning and we pulled out before breakfast and ate near a nice grove.

All the other people we met were fine and likely the ones just mentioned would have been on closer acquaintance.

I answered the personal letters of many who wrote and six of the letters were returned to me, Helen Anast, Mildred Wand, Emily Breemer, Pearl Evans, Gertrude Anderson and Henry Priebe could not be found at addresses given.

We are wintering in a six-room house, five miles from town and but eighteen miles east of the Missouri River. The land is slightly rolling but one can see for many miles. Soil is ash color with few rocks. Our well is many hundred feet deep and the water tastes salty. Crops were very good last fall and the land is expensive. On this side of the river are fine farms and on the other side, I am told, are ranches.

Well, L. T., letting your angry passions rise isn't going to change that hubby of yours and separation isn't best either. Just develop your own personality; laugh, sing and live your life as though you enjoyed it. If he insists upon arranging the furniture, let him. After all, it is his home as well as yours. I could stand a few chairs out of place better than I could a quarrel. Do not let yourself get troubled about such things—but instead do so much to please him that he will forget the pocketbook deal eventually. Life is so short that it doesn't pay to bicker over trifles that come up.

I am glad you disagree with me, Bud. Do you know, I disagree with my own self about half of the time.

Disillusioned, you ask whether Pearl Vesey ever had any great trouble or disappointment—I have been husking corn beside three lively youngsters. The rows were all alike and just as long but one kiddie saw all the "nubbins", smut, icy places and bad weather; the wild sunflowers would scratch her face and make her cross. The other two saw only the beautiful corn, the birds and rabbits, pretty stones, flocks and ducks and geese going over. They sang and laughed and kept a merry rat tat tat sounding against the throw board. Even though their mittens wore through and their fingers got scratched, and their toes grew cold, they were sorry when the day was over and begged to do just one more row.

Life is like these rows, and will average up in the long run. You may get cold feet on one end but if you wear a grin on the other you will be able to husk your row without making it disagreeable for your side steppers.

P. V. likely gets her share of the hard rows for her life is now, and has been, a constant struggle against poverty, illness and disappointments. Dear ones have gone before, and sometimes her corn has failed to hit the throw board at all; and she, too, is disillusioned, but she hops right over there and picks it up again.

Troubles and disappointments are pesky things but like cabbages and other things that grow, they need air and if you don't air 'em they just naturally wither and die. I don't like trouble so I just smother it quietly at home and forget it. I've a good "forgettery" too, but land knows when I'd forget some of my failures and disappointments were I to air them where some of you could sympathize with me.

I've been in most of the states and in Canada and have found that people who count their many blessings fail to see troubles at all.

I noticed a letter from Verne Ellis, Allegan, Mich., in the October COMFORT and he aired not a "troub", but I happen to know that he had to stop work entirely in 1903—rheumatism. Since December, 1910, he has existed in a ten by eleven room, even to eating his meals there, and he hasn't a home of his own either. He is in constant pain but doesn't give up, and he managed to earn a little money too. I hope you who fancy you have trouble will think of him—a young man over six feet tall, sitting year in and year out, behind one single window, and I know you will be able to see the sunny side in the future.

I don't know whose letter I like best but I know the sunny ones help most.

There are no old maids nowadays—they are all bachelor girls, and they aren't sour, long-faced girls either.

About adopting kiddies—blood may count in some ways but you can very easily learn to love another's child. My mother did and I am "it." That is all tommyrot about not being able to care for them on that account, for you know that you love your husband and he isn't one of your own blood either.

Will someone tell me where I can buy an allover apron pattern, called the "Camping Apron." It looks like a princess slip but has long sleeves and a high neck.

I wanted to discuss so many things but my letter is getting long.

I shall write a book when I get old and I'll call it, oh, I believe I'll name it "Homeshac" after the little cabin we left back in the big woods, and I'll write and write until it's fatter than Mehitable Elizabeth—she's my diary.

I don't get time to read much now for I have to be tutoress for the children. I am told that South Dakota is a thousand teachers short and our two nearest schools are among the "shorts" in spite of high wages offered. I am learning patience, and we have the nicest times at our home school, and though we make a big game of it all, I think they are doing well. We have found a fine book, on etiquette, to study and we are trying to do and be, at home, just exactly as we would wish to appear in other places.

Hereafter we will read only stories from which we can learn something, for I read aloud nearly every evening and the kiddies keep their ears open. Sometimes when Daddy returns from work he finds us a bit noisy. We also sing and Daddy has to keep time with his toes, even while he is hanging up his coat. We have found out where we can buy Boy Scout and Camp Fire Girl stories, so the coming evenings aren't worrying us a bit.

I'll send my picture some other time.

Your affectionate sister, PEARL VESEY.

OAKLAND, MD.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON, COMFORT SISTERS AND BROTHERS:

I entered your happy circle once before so I am coming again, being requested to do so. Indeed, I should have written before but just never did it.

Pearl Vesey, do you know I enjoyed reading your letter nearly as much as though I had been with you. But here I am talking on an entirely different subject than I am to write about.

School has started once more and I hope the teachers are having good success with their work. I will give you the rules for each day, as they are found on the question sheet of each enrolled Health Crusader.

1. I washed my hands before each meal.
2. I washed not only my face but my ears and neck and I cleaned my finger nails.
3. I tried to keep my fingers, pencils and everything that might be unclean out of my mouth and nose.
4. I drank a glass of water before each meal and before going to bed, and drank no tea, coffee nor other injurious drinks.
5. I brushed my teeth thoroughly in the morning and in the evening.
6. I took ten or more slow, deep breaths of fresh air.
7. I played outdoors or with my windows open more than thirty minutes.
8. I was in bed ten hours or more last night and kept my window open.
9. I tried today to sit up straight, to eat slowly and to atttend to the toilet and each need of my body at its regular time.
10. I tried today to keep neat and cheerful constantly and to be helpful to others.
11. I took a full bath on each day of the week that is checked.

There are other rules similar to these but it would take up too much space to tell everything. Anyone desiring a more complete sketch of it can write to the National Tuberculosis Association, 381 Fourth Ave., New York, or write to me and I will give you an address in your state where you can get the things necessary to start a Health Crusader Club, as there is a State Director and distributor in every state in the Union. The Crusaders are children from six to sixteen years of age, who agree to the pledge printed on the certificate of enrollment. The one doing the most rules every day receives a badge; after he has done so many chores he receives a silver badge, then a gold pin for the highest rank.

S. C. Sheppard, come again and tell us more of your wonderful adventures. ANNA PETERSON.

Anna.—Thanks for giving us the rules of the Health Crusader Club. They could be followed to good advantage by grown-ups as well as children. —Ed.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I wish to offer my mite, a good way to make pin money, and ask help.

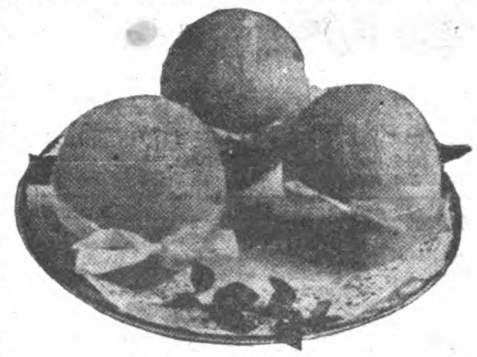
TEMPTING FOOD FOR THE SICK-ABED



By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE prettiest dishes the house affords should always be used on the invalid's tray if you would have the food sufficiently tempting to arouse the interest of the sick one, for at best the appetite is fickle and requires coaxing. Because the digestive juices are slower in starting with the sick, their drinks and food should be put into and covered with hot dishes, as heat stimulates. Another reason is, that they eat slowly and as the food cools it becomes unpalatable.

As eating a prescribed diet from a tray soon becomes monotonous, the serving is all the more important. Little surprises such as cutting an orange in two, scooping out the inside, filling it with orange jelly and putting it together again and tying a narrow ribbon around, will produce a gleam of curiosity and expectancy that makes the tray more welcome.

Eggs and milk separately, or combined, are usually included in the invalid's diet, but as both these foods lack the appetizing flavors found in fruit and vegetables, the patient soon wearies of them and will dread their appearance. For this reason, ways of making these dishes more tempting must be devised, and with a degree of pains success will follow. The sick are usually allowed to take orange and lemon juice, but it must be squeezed from the fruit and then strained.

"Sing a Song of Sick Men;
They'll drink some orange juice,
And will they call the doctor then?
Of course not—what's the use?"

Milk should be given to the sick in small quantities and taken very slowly, for as soon as it meets the acid of the gastric juice, it changes to a soft, cheese-like substance, which will overwork the digestion if taken immoderately.

Eggs taken raw are highly advisable for the sick. But if to be cooked, put the eggs into the boiling water, cover closely and set on back of stove for about ten minutes to keep hot but not boil. Experience will teach just how long. If boiled, the white will become "leathery" before the heat reaches the yolk, rendering the whole egg indigestible. Eggs should be shelled as soon as cooked, as they will harden if they remain in the shell.

An egg cooked just below the boiling point for twenty minutes will be hard but evenly cooked. If the yolk is "mealy" the egg is digestible. A smiling face penciled on the shell before the egg is cooked will amuse your patient.

Egg Beverages

EGG ORANGADE.—Put into a pint preserving jar the white of one egg, the juice of an orange, and one or two teaspoons of sugar. Adjust the rubber and top and shake well until mixed and foamy. Add one quarter of a cup of water and shake again. This must be served at once. It will amuse the patient to shake the ade from the tray.

EGG GRUEL.—Beat the yolk of one egg with a teaspoon of sugar; slowly add one cup of scalding milk, then the white of egg beaten until foamy, not stff.

EGG LEMONADE.—Into the pint preserving jar put one egg, one half cup of cold water, two tablespoons of lemon juice, and one tablespoon of sugar. Shake until well mixed and frothy.

EGGNOG.—Beat the yolk of one egg until creamy, add one tablespoonful of sugar and beat again. Flavor with a grating of nutmeg or orange rind and stir in one cup of fresh milk. Beat the white of egg stiff and lightly stir it in. Serve at once as it will settle.

EGG AND BEEF TEA.—Beat the yolk of an egg, add a small pinch of salt, and slowly pour in one cup of hot beef tea, stirring continually. Add the beaten white lastly if desired.

Other Foods for the Sick

COFFEE JUNKET.—Make lukewarm one cup of milk, stir in one teaspoon of sugar and two tablespoons of very strong coffee. Add one fourth of a junket tablet that has been dissolved in one teaspoon of cold water. Pour into an attractive glass dish to set.

APPLE SURPRISE.—Bake two tart apples in a hot oven. Scoop out of the skins and remove every particle of core. While hot, add one teaspoon of butter, a dash of cinnamon, a little grated lemon peel, and sugar to taste. Add one beaten egg, and then beat the whole mixture with the egg beater until fluffy. Put into a small bowl and bake in a very moderate oven until set. Serve hot or cold with a little orange or prune juice.

BAKED CRACKER TOAST.—Split two milk biscuits and toast a light brown in the oven. Dip very quickly into boiling salted water. Butter generously, spread with marmalade or preserve, put into an even pile and thoroughly heat through in the oven just before serving.

CUSTARD CREAMS.—Bring one cup of milk to a scald in a double boiler, add one fourth cup of sugar, and stir in one slightly rounding tablespoon of corn-starch previously wet with a little cold water, and a pinch of salt. Stir continually and cook about eight minutes. Beat the white of one egg stiff and over it pour the custard, beating until the separate particles of white have disappeared. The heat of the custard will cook the white of egg.

APRICOT SURPRISE.—Butter a bowl, and into it put a thin slice of bread and butter, then a layer of stewed and sweetened apricot. Cover this with a slice of bread and butter, and sprinkle the top with brown sugar. Bake in a hot oven until the brown sugar has melted and partly candied. Dot with a little whipped cream. This is delicious and tempting in appearance.

Fortunes Founded Through Luck

THEODORE N. VAIL.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ROBERT Louis Stevenson's greatest piece of luck was the old map of an island he turned up in a garret one day. The bit of parchment had a strange fascination for him—and suggested "Treasure Island," his most successful literary effort, of which the map is a frontispiece.

Theodore N. Vail, president of the American

THEODORE N. VAIL.

Telephone & Telegraph Company, and some thirty other corporations, owes his luck also to a map. "I made a map of Iowa," he told me once, "and almost straightway it brought me success."

Theodore Newton Vail, one of our most prominent and successful captains of industry, grew up in Ohio, studied medicine with an uncle in Morristown, N. J., and then went home, to Iowa, to which State his parents had removed. He gave up medicine for telegraphy, his first job being as operator in an Iowan village. Then he was promoted to the railway mail service, in those day run in a slipshod way, the mails never being sorted and made up en route.

And now we come to the map talisman.

"I began, after this promotion," continued Mr. Vail, "to study the State of Iowa. I learned all the lines of railroads, all the post offices, the running time of all the mail trains, and then I made a map of Iowa and marked off hours when the mail could be delivered quickest. I soon was delivering my mail with almost perfect connections and therefore delivering it quicker than anyone else.

"That map," concluded Mr. Vail, "landed me on the road to success, for in some way it came to the attention of the Federal authorities at the Capitol, and in 1873 I was appointed assistant superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, and in 1875 general superintendent."

In 1878 Mr. Vail was asked by Gardner C. Hubbard, Professor Bell's father-in-law, to become general manager of his telephone company at $3,500 a year. In those days the telephone was scarcely better than a toy, but Mr. Vail was confident of its success. Taking up his new duties with enthusiasm, he soon had long-distance wires operating, though his first attempt failed, bringing jeers from the doubting Thomases.

Reminiscing about the Boston-Providence line that failed—Vail's Folly, as it was called, Mr. Vail said:

"With the same perseverance with which I made my crude railroad map of Iowa, I kept my engineers at it. They doubled the wires and our troubles were over! We had established the metalic circuit and the long-distance line.

"That is why I always remember my lucky map of Iowa. If I had not made that, I'd never have been assistant head of the Railway Mail Service, nor would Hubbard have known of me and made me manager of the telephone company in the days when it was a joke. That map was my luck—my mascot!"

All of which only goes to show that good, honest, conscientious work is seldom wasted. The world has its eyes wide open for such work, and the boy or man who does it seldom, in the long run, has to charge it to the Profit & Loss account.

It pays to study your job!

My husband's health was poor and as we have a large family it was necessary that I earn money. I tried many things but failed until I thought of baby clothes. I did all kinds of fancy work, but pretty baby things were my delight so I advertised in our home paper and found many mothers willing to turn their tiny garments over to me. I am never so happy as when making baby clothes, and almost any woman can do this.

Will someone tell me a good remedy for weak eyes? Won't other sisters tell of their adventures in earning money?

With love to all, MRS. HOPE LANE.

Mrs. Lane.—Making baby things is about the most fascinating work I know of but your weak eyes may be caused by too close application to your work. Consult an oculist, wear glasses if necessary, and do not sew by a poor light.—Ed.

OKLAHOMA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Please admit me, a man, to reply to Udeyne whose letter appeared in the November issue. I find Udeyne says most men are selfish creatures. I haven't seen any wings on any of the sisters yet.

I will affirm that women as a race are more deceitful and more treacherous than men and I believe that women as a rule have more "gall and brass" than a man and think the general public will agree with me there. I know that a good woman is the greatest treasure a man could possibly possess and he should appreciate her more and more and be satisfied if he never had anything but her. I know we men are all subject to wrong and do wrong but still the women as a rule are all in the same row.

Come again Rainy Day. I admire you. I think you should call yourself Rosebud, June Rose or something sweet instead of a dreary rainy day. I am sure you deserve a better name.

Love to all. KNOT HEAD.

Knot Head.—Mebbe we deserve all you say about us, mebbe so, and it is only fair that the men should have an equal opportunity of expressing their opinions, but I tremble when I think of your fate at the hands, and pens, of the sisters. I commend you to their mercy.—Ed.

PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

May I come in? How glad I am, for I've kept silent so long I'm just boiling over.

Celia Jolly, let's shake hands for our husbands must have met each other to get the same views of making love instead of quarreling. We have been married twelve years and all the years have been happy ones. Our motto is "Be reasonable and loving."

Bachelor Bill, shame on you, paying your wife wages as though she were a servant. You and I could not agree as I think a wife should be equal. We have only one pocketbook and each does the spending.

Would you like to know me a little better? Well, here I am. Five feet, four inches tall, weigh 100 pounds. Have dark brown hair, brown eyes, even white teeth, a dimple in my left cheek and am of a dark complexion. As I said before, I have one of the best Johns ever and five little V's, Velma, ten, Vira, eight, Victor, six, Virginia, three, and Volt, nine months old and the dearest ever.

I had very poor health after my second child was born and did not walk for six months but God took care of me and I am able to do my work as well as the sewing for myself and children. Until now, with the exception of an overcoat, I have made all the oldest boy's clothes but he is getting too big to wear clothes made from his daddy's wornout ones. I also find time for crocheting and other fancy work. But I never hurry. We make a great mistake when we hurry and worry. If I don't get all my work done today it goes until the next and nobody is the worse off.

Sisters, did you ever try folding the towels, dish towels, sheets, diapers and such like right off the line into a basket? It saves much labor. I used to think every tiny piece of cloth had to be ironed but when a person is down and out they will do lots sometimes to gain a little strength and I find it pays to take care of yourself.

Children make lots of work but one little hug and kiss pays for it all. I believe in teaching them to help. Velma and Vira can wash dishes and scrub as well as I can and even Victor does what falls to his lot, but I don't believe in making them work too hard or keep them at one thing all the time. I wash dishes when I can and let them play and then when I am not well or tired or too busy they do them without grumbling and without pennies. I do not believe in paying them to do their work.

Have any of you the poem, "When Father Rode the Goat?" I'd like to get it.

I will leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson.

CONTENT.

Content and Others.—I don't want to be selfish and unobliging but I wish in cases where there is nothing very personal in the letter—no heart-throb stuff—that the writer would give her name and address, if she wants letters forwarded. It would save hours and hours of my time in looking up addresses.—Ed.

SHERIDAN, Birney Star Route, WYO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

A year ago my sister, Mrs. Edna Newinger, contracted the deadly flu and we lost her. Among her things I found some crocheting which I think some one sent her to sell for them. I have been unable to find the owner so am turning to this corner thinking perhaps it might belong to some reader of COMFORT. Both she and my mother took this paper and wrote to some of the sisters at different times. If this meets the eye of the one who did the crocheting and they will write me I will be glad to return it to them. Or there is a possibility the lace was sent to my mother, Mrs. Jacob Geier, who died a few months before my sister. Either of them would have liked to have the lace returned to the owner and I hope I may find her through COMFORT. In writing please describe the design.

Sincerely, MINNIE M. MOORE.

DUMAS, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

This is my first attempt to write to COMFORT or any other paper and I feel as though I was being watched and can hear someone say, "You won't get in." I think COMFORT the best paper of all and you can believe me when I tell you I have been reading it twenty odd years and aim to renew my subscription for two years.

ELBY RAY AND SHELBY FAY GASAWAY, DUMAS, ARK.

Mrs. Wilkinson, I hope you will find room for the picture of my twin boys. They were four years old when this was taken but are ten now and can pick one hundred and fifteen pounds of cotton a day. Their names are Elby Ray and Shelby Fay and we call them Ray and Fay.

A COMFORT Reader, MRS. D. C. GASAWAY.

ISLAND FALLS, R. R. 1, MAINE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Although I have read COMFORT a number of years I have never attempted to enter the Sisters' Corner before. My mother has taken COMFORT ever since she kept house and as soon as I got into a home of my own it became a member of the family. That was eleven years ago.

We live on a 240-acre farm in Aroostook county. A great many of the readers do not know what work means but if they lived on a farm where they planted from twenty to one hundred acres of potatoes and forty or fifty acres of oats, besides wheat, and a woman had to be jack of all trades, doing the work in the house for a family of seven, putting in the garden and caring for it, and raking at haying time and milking from three to five cows every night, then is the time that a woman has to take some quick steps.

As I like to have the sisters describe themselves I will do the same. I am a young mother of four youngsters, three boys and one girl. Am five feet, three inches tall and weigh 112 pounds so you see I am small as well as young. My children range in age from ten years to 18 months.

It seems as though among the vast numbers of readers I should be able to find a grandmother. I would like to have live with us a nice gentle little woman about 50 or 55 years of age who would be willing to help with the darning and patching and little chores in the family, one who has good health, but no relatives and no home of her own and who would like to live on a good farm with good surroundings and have a peaceful home. My husband and I have a deep regard for old age and when health failed she would get the best of care and attention. Please write to me.

MRS. O. H. ADAMS.

GEORGIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Just a few words to "Worried Mother" about her boy. I wonder if she, like myself, tried force with her son, until at last she has decided to try patient kindness to the utmost. I find my boy will study more for me if I compliment his work. From complete van and its scattered load, the smoke was billowing about it. Falling brands had set fire to some of the released contents of the trunks. Hardly thinking of self, he crept resolutely into the pall of smoke.

Soon, guided by his intuition, he was among the scattered papers. Some of them were afire, and he could not see to catch the merest word on any of them. In the midst of his despair the wind tossed aside the smoke clouds and left him free to use eyes and hands to some purpose.

He picked up packet after packet, only to cast each aside with a hasty glance. At last he picked up one charring bundle, and gave a fierce cry of joy as he read the written words: "Papers Concerning the Grayson Affair."

As he lifted himself erect and slipped the small bundle into his pocket, the crack of a firearm pierced the roaring crackle of devouring flame and a bullet whizzed past his face.

Neil had been mistaken for one of the human vultures whose cupidity led them into deadly peril! Ere another shot could be fired, perhaps with more telling effect, the friendly smoke once more swept around him and hid him from view. Turning with the precious bundle safely in his pocket, Neil effected his escape to Union Square, where he threw himself, exhausted but exultant, on the hard ground.

Surely there was a providence in all this! A higher power must be watching over the fortunes of his sweet bride, or such a chance would never have come Neil's way.

As the verse of the stirring song that had swept through Portsmouth Square had inspired his hope and faith, so now this bit of fortune lent wings to Neil's drooping confidence. The Power that could so befriend his darling would shield her under its mighty pinions, and he and she should meet, in happier times, in love and safety.

For an hour he rested, then formed in line and received a draft of water and a slender ration of food which the soldiers were dispensing. Then he set himself to think what had best be done with the precious papers which had come so wonderfully into his possession.

He feared to carry them about with him, for, if they were what he hoped and believed, their value went into the hundreds of thousands. They represented the undoing of Berdyne, as well as the wealth and station of poor, wronged Beryl, who had been compelled to toil through another's iniquity.

Ah, yes, those papers meant even more than that! Once his darling was restored to what was rightfully hers, Neil's proud relatives would kneel to do her homage.

"What will not wealth do?" Neil thought bitterly. "My peerless Beryl, whom I loved for herself, will take a different station in the eyes of the world when she comes into her own. For myself I do not care; possessing her love, I am rich beyond the dreams of avarice. Yet I would have her on a social level with the rest of my purse-proud family; yea, I would have them at her feet, begging her favor!"

He could think of but one person in that hour who had the facilities to care for the papers as they should be cared for. His cousin, Arthur Preston, of Nob Hill, had a fireproof safe in his residence. Arthur would guard the papers, Neil knew. Not yet was Nob Hill in danger of the flames, and it might escape them altogether; yet, even if it did not, the papers would be safe in the vault where the silver and the other household valuables were stored.

It was eight o'clock in the evening when Neil, his course luridly lighted by the fire, left Union Square for his long walk to the aristocratic residence district of the doomed city. A surprise was awaiting him there.

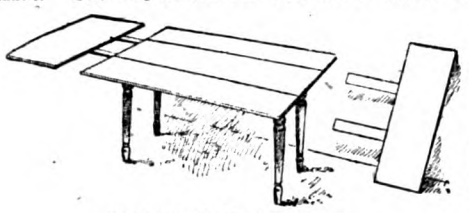
Avenues That Lead to Thrift

By Estelle Garland

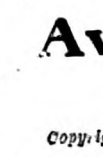


Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

WITH most women there exists in the mind a constant desire to get all they can from whatever material is at hand and to use such materials instead of putting money into the purchase of something no better, even if a little newer in style. We always like to hear the remark, "It answers the purpose," for it has a satisfactory ring, showing the effort has not been in vain.

In the following "avenues" we hope many an individual need will be filled, and that in the working out the results will prove that it was time well spent.

Table Extension



An ordinary drop-leaf kitchen table may have an extension at one or both ends that will greatly increase its seating capacity. When not required, it is easily removed. Use the same thickness of boards from which the table is made. Cut the extensions the exact width of table when the leaves are up, and as deep as required; about one foot is practicable. Cut two strips four inches wide, seven eighths of an inch thick and two and a half feet long. Screw the strips to the underside of extension so they will come just inside of the framework of the table, where well-fitting slots are cut, through which the strips are pushed to hold the extension level and secure.

Unique Book-Rack

The foundation of this book-rack was made from an old organ stool. The top is removed and a post filled into the socket. Cut a top eight inches wide by twenty long. Make the two ends and two section pieces five inches high.

Picture Frame Tray

An old picture frame makes a very atttractive tray; oval, square or oblong. Small tubes of bronze will restore a gilt frame, and bronze handles can be bought at a small cost. Wooden frames should be sandpapered, then stained and varnished, or just the dull finish which is obtained by the staining itself. If wooden handles are unobtainable, use brass ones. Under the glass mount a piece of embroidery, a pretty pattern of crocheted filet, a bright cretonne design, or a piece of handsome wallpaper.

Handy Clothes Sprinkler

A clothes sprinkler is not new, but perhaps a home-made one is. Use any of the tin screw-topped bottles or jars that various kinds of preserves come in, and pierce the top with fine holes, not larger than those in a peppershaker. It will be necessary to put a rubber band onto top of jar before adjusting the top. Another device is to use a bottle and large-sized rubber nipple, piercing the nipple full of holes. This is best done by using a red-hot wire, which will leave an opening, while if only pierced cold, the hole will close and prevent the water shaking through. The device is also useful for spraying plants.

Broom or Mop Holder

The life of a broom is doubled if it rests in a holder when not in use. When the broom-ends have become turned to one side by being stood in the corner, the broom sweeps hard, does poor work and breaks quickly. A simple device by which a broom may be hung is to put long nails or screws through two large spools, and just far enough apart to prevent the broom from slipping through. Dipping a broom in scalding water several times a week also lengthens the life of the broom, keeping it pliable and prevents breaking.

The mop should also be hung after being dried out of doors. If put away wet, it will sour and rust the holder.

Convenient Candle Holder

A tin can makes the best kind of a candle holder. Trim the top edge evenly, cut an opening down one side as shown in illustration, and turn over the edges to make them round and even. Cut two narrow strips of tin; about a quarter of an inch wide and two and a half long. In the bottom of the tin, at the center scratch a circle the size of a candle. On each side of the circle, punch four openings and insert the strips of tin, bringing the other ends up through at the opposite side of circle. Bend each of the four ends upright and a socket for the candle is formed. For the handle, cut a strip of tin and turn under the edge. In the back of candle holder, cut two slits horizontally, and the width of the handle, one exactly beneath the other. Put the ends of the handle through these slits, turning them back about one inch in opposite directions. Paint outside of candle holder. If a soldering outfit is at hand, a circle of tin soldered together and into the bottom for the socket, and the handle soldered into place, the work is easier.

HOME-MADE.

Towel Rack

There are never hanging racks enough for towels, aprons, dusters, etc. With practically no cost, several may be made to hang in different places. Take old broom handles, cut into three lengths, and in one end of each bore a hole through which the discarded pin of an old door hinge will easily work. Cut a solid piece of wood about seven inches long, two inches wide and one inch thick. Near the bottom, nail a small block the width of strip, and above this nail another block of the same size, leaving sufficient space between blocks to admit thickness of the three pieces of broom handles; bore perpendicularly through both blocks a hole to fit the hinge pin. Now place the bored broom-handle ends between the blocks so that the holes will all come in line, and then slip the pin through, and you have a handy rack. A large wire nail may be used in place of pin.

Stool or Foot Rest

One of the newest models in a footstool can readily be made at home. It is also a piece of furniture which children enjoy. It can be made any height, but twelve inches high and wide, by twenty-four long, are satisfactory dimensions. Make a fairly heavy frame, with legs about four inches square, so that it cannot be easily tipped. Underneath the "box" which is formed by the frame, tack strong bagging. Fill with excelsior or straw, put in smoothly and firmly. On top of this put layers of cotton, or an old piece of comforter can be used. Cover with strong material such as denim or cretonne. Around the lower edge of frame, on the outside, tack upholsterer's braid, or use a narrow strip of the same material as cover.

STRONG AND USEFUL.

The Two-Part Door

A door in two parts is a blessing to the mother who must be caring for the little ones at the same time she is attending to her household duties. Besides the care of having the children always in the kitchen until the work is done, there is the attending fear from drafts and other unavoidable exposures. The half door, that is, the door cut in two parts just above the lower panels, with the lower half bolted, and the upper half open, allows the mother to see and hear all that goes on inside the adjoining room. Another feature that will strongly recommend itself to mothers is that this plan allows the little ones not yet able to walk about, to roll on a comforter, spread for this purpose on the floor, instead of being tied in a high-chair where no physical development is taking place. Indeed, too much high-chair has caused many a weak and bent spine.

Baby Tender

An ingenious device by which a child may receive healthful physical exercise and learn to walk at the same time is within the reach of every mother. As shown in the illustration, an ordinary kitchen chair was used. The legs should be cut off so that the seat will form a comfortable resting place for the little arms. This is a very important feature, as it must not be high enough to raise the shoulders. It is well to make a thin covering for the chair, as baby's arms may not have other protection. Use a set of good casters in chair legs.

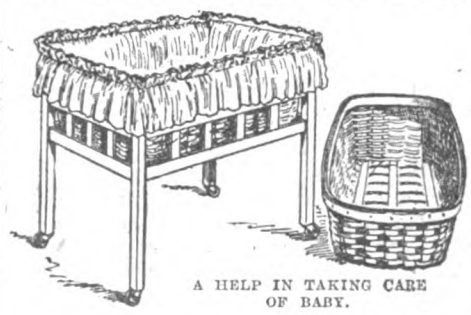
Food Containers

Make yourself a row of attractive containers for dry groceries by decorating tin boxes and cans. Automobile paint does the best work as it adheres perfectly to the tin, applies smoothly and dries in a few hours. It also has the virtue of washing perfectly. Cracker boxes with hinged covers which close tightly will keep bread, doughnuts, cookies and cake in good condition and are much easier to handle than the old-fashioned stone crock.

PREVENTS SPOILAGE.

If any tin container is not tight in the seams and causes food to dry, or weevils to get into contents, melt paraffin and pour it on, a little at a time, until openings are filled. After this treatment, containers will hold cold liquids indefinitely.

Bassinet Resting on Frame



An ordinary clothes basket makes an ideal bassinet for babe-in-arms, and offers a way and means by which an infant may always be under a protecting eye, for the basket is easily carried about and can be deposited on two chairs (seats facing), on a table, or even on the floor, providing it is sheltered from drafts or open windows.

The first illustration shows the completed bassinet resting on a frame-work, constructed for the purpose. This frame has no floor on which the basket rests, but instead the strips of wood from which the lower part of frame is built are wide enough to form inside shelves along the sides and across the ends. The basket when in place rests on these shelves.

The basket is covered inside with white cotton cloth, and then relined on the inside with fulled dotted muslin. The same finish is given the outside if the frame is not to be used. Hanging from top edge of basket is a deep valance.

A pillow of curled hair or one of feathers is used as a mattress. Use little if any extra pillow under baby's head which should be kept on a level with its body. The bassinet makes an excellent bed, providing there is ample protection against the night chill.

To Extract Corks

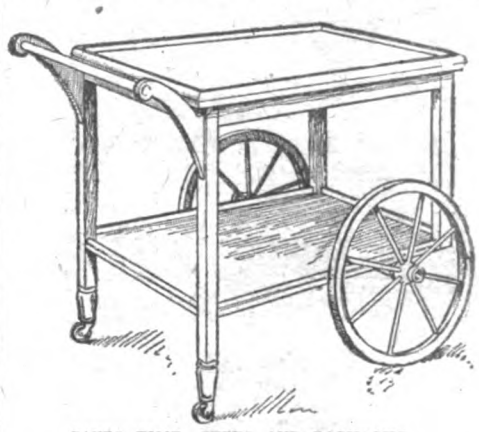
When a cork gets pushed into a bottle while still in use, thread a button on a strong string, drop the button under the cork and pull it to top of bottle, and hold it firmly with the left hand while with the right the cork can be picked out with a corkscrew or hat pin.

Discarded inner tubes always have some places that are unbroken, and these make the best kind of rubber bands. Hold the tube with edges even and cut through both sides at once any width desired. Very narrow ones are the most elastic and are strong enough for any ordinary purpose.

In case of sickness, prevent the noise of closing doors by putting a small pad over the bolt in lock and holding it in place by tying to the door-knob on both sides.

VERY USEFUL.

To Guard Against Poison



If there is a bottle of poison in the house, besides labeling it as such, insert four pins in opposite directions in the cork. This device cannot be improved upon, for no one can draw the cork, even in the dark, without being reminded that it is something to be careful of.

Kitchen Wagon

A portable table or tray is a device of great assistance to any busy housewife, for it saves many a step and many a carry. Probably the first use for such a servitor was the tea-wagon, from which English ladies served their national drink, afternoon tea. When the first tea-wagon was used in America I do not know, but true it is that today it is much appreciated, and its use has been extended from merely a place to hold afternoon dainties to that of waitress, to carry at one time a large portion, if not all, of a meal from kitchen to dining-room, and on its return to take back the remaining food and dishes. And thus the possibilities of such a wagon cannot prove other than an asset to the progressive housewife who is ever regretful of the time consumed in fetching and carrying a few things at a time from room to room. And as we have so improved upon the use of the tea-wagon, let us also improve upon its name, and call it the "kitchen-wagon."

The design of our new kitchen-wagon is so clearly shown in the illustration that little need be said in explanation of its construction and use. It is in fact a small table so mounted on two wheels and equipped with a push-handle as to serve as an indoor push-cart operated on the wheelbarrow principle.

The front legs are cut short so not to reach the floor. The wheels are so located, forward of the center but not at the extreme front, that they carry the larger part of the weight, taking care, however, to place them far enough forward to avoid danger of tipping forward when the table is unevenly loaded. The two rear legs are mounted on casters, preferably ball-bearing, and are of such length that, when resting on the floor, the table top will be level. A bracket extends backward from each side of the table top and through the ends of these is passed a bar (broomstick answers the purpose) to serve as a push-handle.

The cart can be pushed or pulled forward or backward resting on the wheels and casters, or, by lifting on the push-handle, the rear legs can be raised from the floor so that the cart will travel on the wheels exclusively; which is desirable in turning a short corner or passing over the edge of a rug.

The table should be about thirty inches high, of convenient length, say two to three feet, and of such width as to allow ample clearance for the wheels in passing through doorways.

The kitchen cart is easy of home construction. If you haven't a small table suitable for the purpose you can make one. Most any small wheels, readily obtainable, will do; or perhaps the home artisan can make a pair. Rubber tires are a desirable addition and can be cut from old automobile tires or inner tubes and cemented on the rims.

Make a shelf about fifteen inches from the floor, and around it tack a seven-eighths quarter-round moulding to prevent dishes from sliding to floor. If the top is to serve more than one purpose, make the protecting moulding for the

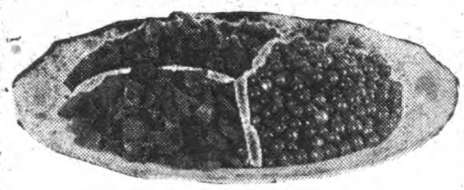
USING MAPLE SUGAR

By Violet Marsh



GRIDDLE CAKES AND MAPLE SYRUP.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett Pub., Inc.

THE housewife who has substituted maple for cane sugar during the days of conservation will welcome the coming of the new crop, for she discovered that for many purposes it is superior to any other sweetening. Of course every one knew, who has ever tried it, that with griddle cakes maple syrup has no rival, but it required a shortage of granulated sugar to sharpen our appreciation. In reality, maple sugar comes of a very old and honorable lineage, for in the homes of our forefathers it was used for all purposes and even now there are remote parts in the North where "white sugar" is little seen.

MAPLE CREAM.—Boil two thirds cup of maple syrup until it "threads," and then in a fine stream pour it over the stiffly beaten white of one egg, beating continuously. When cool, beat in one half cup of cream that has been beaten fairly stiff. Serve cold as a sauce for sponge cakes, boiled rice, etc.

MAPLE CAKES.—Cream together one cup of maple sugar, which has been rolled fine, and one half cup of butter. Add one beaten egg, three tablespoons of good molasses one half cup of sour milk, and one scant teaspoon of salt, and beat hard. Sift together one teaspoon of soda and two and one half cups of flour, and then mix with two and one half cups of oatmeal. Add to mixture, beat and stir very thoroughly and bake in drop cakes in a fairly quick oven.

POTATOES, CARROTS AND PEAS.

MAPLE CUSTARD SUNDAE.—Roll fine one half cup of maple sugar and beat with four lightly beaten eggs. Add a quarter of a teaspoon of salt and two and one half cups of scalding hot milk. Beat hard and pour into custard cups, and set into a baking pan with a little water in the bottom. Bake in a moderate oven until a knife will come out clean when inserted. Do not bake too long. When cold, turn out onto individual dishes and cover with "maple cream" or a sauce made from whipping cream and maple syrup together.

MAPLE TOAST.—Toast bread to a golden brown in the oven. Butter, spread with maple sugar, give it a dash of cinnamon, and return toast to oven until the sugar melts.

MAPLE FILLING.—Boil together one and one half cup of sugar and one fourth of a cup of water until it "threads." Beat to a stiff froth two egg whites, and in a fine stream pour over the syrup, beating continuously. Add one half cup of chopped nut meats and one teaspoon of vanilla, and spread between layer cake before it "sets."

A GOOD SYRUP.—When it is necessary to extend the maple flavor, use caramelized granulated sugar. Put one cup of sugar in a saucepan on the back of the stove where it will melt very slowly. When it becomes a light brown color, add one cup of maple sugar and one half cup of boiling water, and when it boils and the maple is melted, remove from fire. For a richer syrup, add one teaspoon of butter and one of vanilla. Maple syrup is used in the same way.

PEACH RICE CREAM.

GRIDDLE CAKES.—Two cups of sifted flour, sifted again with one even teaspoon of soda, and one half teaspoon of salt. Beat into the flour until smooth, two cups of sour milk, add the well-beaten yolks of two eggs and then the whites beaten stiff. Cook on a hot griddle greased with a piece of salt pork held with a fork. Turn when full of bubbles.

BREAD GRIDDLE CAKES.—Soak over night two cups of fine corn or brown bread-crumbs in two cups of scalding milk and one tablespoon of butter. In the morning stir smooth, add the well-beaten yolks of two eggs, one quarter of a cup of cold milk, and one cup of flour sifted with two even teaspoons of baking powder, and when smooth add the well-beaten whites of eggs.

Macaroni and How to Use It

Let us not overlook macaroni as a nutritious and economical food. Formerly we associated the entire family, macaroni, spaghetti and vermicelli, with Italy, where it became famous for excellency and variety, but now, thanks to American industry, we have the Made-in-America product which stands the test of comparison.

History points out that centuries ago macaroni was made and eaten in Asia, and that travelers journeying westward brought the news of this valuable product. Following the lead of Italy, the French began to manufacture macaroni, and in course of time Japan was making it from beans and buckwheat, and China from rice and the pith of a certain tree. Two products, one made from milk curd, and the other from egg and wheat, find great favor with the Italians.

The American macaroni is practically all made from wheat containing a large percentage of gluten, and this is chiefly grown in the semi-arid parts of our own western states. This particular class of wheat is less valuable for milling purposes, but is the more nourishing because of its large gluten content.

The first step in preparing wheat for macaroni is to grind it into a coarse meal-like consistency and remove the bran. This is called semola, which in turn is mixed into a paste with hot water and a dough is formed by mechanical methods. Here the mixture is put into cylinders, and forced through perforations of requisite sizes respectively for macaroni, spaghetti or vermicelli. The first process of drying is a partial evaporation of moisture in a current of hot air. It is then subjected to a damp atmosphere for a period of time that only the experienced can determine, and finally hung to dry over rods.

MACARONI, SOUTHERN STYLE—A ONE-DISH MEAL.

Cooking Macaroni

Being so nearly flavorless by itself, macaroni affords a background for many a delicious and substantial meal. It combines with meat, eggs, fish, milk, cheese, and highly flavored vegetables. Macaroni must first be well cooked, and this is an easy matter. Break one quarter of a pound package into shorter lengths, and put it into three pints of boiling water to which one rounding tablespoon of salt has been added. It is well to add the macaroni a little at a time so the water will not stop boiling, as this causes the macaroni to become sticky. Boil until soft, which will take about thirty minutes. Drain in a colander at once and cool by pouring cold water over it. Slow cooking will cause it to steam and become sticky. This applies to cooking macaroni, spaghetti or vermicelli.

BAKED SPAGHETTI AND SALMON.—Melt one tablespoon of butter in a baking dish, and sprinkle with about a quarter of a cup of bread-crumbs. In alternate layers use one cup of canned salmon and two cups of cooked spaghetti, sprinkling each layer with salt, pepper and a little chopped green pepper. Sprinkle with bread-crumbs, pour over one and one half cup of milk and dot with butter. Bake until brown.

BAKED MACARONI.—Make a white sauce by putting two tablespoons of butter in a saucepan where it will melt without browning. When it bubbles, add two tablespoons of dry flour and stir smooth. Have ready a pint of milk brought to the scalding point in a double boiler. Add nearly a cup of the milk and stir until it is smooth and then the remainder. Cook slowly about five minutes, adding one tablespoon of butter, salt and pepper to taste. Put boiled macaroni into a shallow baking dish, pour over the white sauce, sprinkle with fine bread-crumbs and bake until the top browns.

BAKED MACARONI AND CHEESE.—Put boiled macaroni and white sauce sprinkled with grated or finely cut cheese in layers in shallow baking dish, with bread-crumbs softened with butter and sprinkled with cheese on top, and bake until brown.

SPAGHETTI AND TOMATO.—Mince an onion and slowly brown in one tablespoon of butter. Add one tablespoon of dry flour and stir until smooth. Pour over this two cups of cooked and strained tomato, and when thoroughly blended set where it will simmer for half an hour. Season with salt and pepper. Pour over the boiled spaghetti and cook for five minutes.

MACARONI CROQUETTES.—Boil one third of a pound of macaroni, drain, set in cold water ten minutes and drain again. Cut into small pieces. Into a saucepan put four even tablespoons of butter, and when it bubbles, smooth in two tablespoons of dry flour. Pour slowly into this one cup of scalding hot milk, stirring continually. Now beat in two dessert spoons of grated cheese and when thoroughly melted and beaten in, add to the mixture three beaten egg yolks and season with salt and pepper to taste. When cold, shape into cakes or croquettes, roll in fine cracker-crumbs, then in egg and again in crumbs. Fry in deep fat.

MACARONI, SOUTHERN STYLE.—Boil one quarter of a pound of macaroni in salted boiling water. Drain and plunge drainer and macaroni in cold water for a few seconds. Cook half a can of tomatoes twenty minutes and put through strainer. Cook one tablespoon of butter with one of dry flour until it is smooth and bubbles, then slowly add the strained tomato, and salt and pepper to taste. Simmer ten minutes and put in the macaroni, reserving three quarters of a cup. Scald one cup of milk, add one cup of bread-crumbs, three quarters of a cup of cooked chicken or ham chopped fine, one even teaspoon of salt, a little chopped parsley and green pepper, season well with white pepper, add the reserved macaroni and thoroughly stir together; lastly add three well-beaten eggs, and when thoroughly mixed in, make the mixture into cakes, place in a greased baking tin and bake brown in a moderately hot oven. Arrange cakes around the edge of a platter, bring the macaroni and tomato to a boil and pour into center of dish and arrange boiled onions over the top.

General Recipes

POTATOES.—Pare and dice white potatoes; soak in cold water half an hour. Have a very hot oven. In a biscuit pan melt a little fat, just enough to have the pan well greased. Drain potatoes and put in to bake, stirring them frequently with a fork. When well browned they should be done.

CARROTS.—Boil until tender, pare and cut into dice. Toss in melted butter, season with salt and pepper, and a little cream. Serve hot.

PEAS.—Drain peas, put into double boiler with butter, pepper and salt, and when scalding hot they are ready to serve. Canned peas should not be cooked.

PEACH RICE CREAM.—Wash one half cup of rice in several waters. In a double boiler put three cups of fresh milk, and when scalding hot add the rice, three quarters of a cup of sugar, and a scant half teaspoon of salt. Cook until the rice is soft, stirring frequently until the rice kernels no longer settle together. Add one cup of canned peach that has been mashed fine and cook with the rice ten minutes. Soak one rounding tablespoon of granulated gelatine in one quarter of a cup of cold water and add to rice. Stir until well mixed and allow the mixture to cool. Whip one cup of cream. Beat the white of one egg until stiff, stir it well into the whipped cream and then add the mixture to the rice. Pour into mould and, when set, turn out and garnish with sections of whole peach, and serve with sauce made as follows:

SAUCE.—Bring peach juice to a boil with a little grated orange and lemon rind and sugar to taste. Slightly thicken with corn-starch previously wet with cold water. Cook three minutes.

MOCK DUCK.—In about three slices have stale bread enough to make one pint of crumbs, and quickly dip each slice into cold water and let it stand until the bread is just dampened through. Make into crumbs. Chop fine one tablespoon each of onion and celery, one tart apple, and add one scant teaspoon each of thyme, ground sage and marjoram. Have ready one pint of hot mashed potato, and stir it into the other ingredients, and add one rounding teaspoon of salt and a scant quarter of a teaspoon of white pepper. Make the whole mixture very hot in a frying-pan with three tablespoons of fat, remove from fire and beat in rapidly the unbeaten yolks of two eggs. Spread over a slice of round beefsteak, cut one inch thick, roll closely and tie several times. Roll in flour and roast until brown, basting often.

COMBINATION DISH.—Cook half a cup of hominy in all the water it will absorb; remove from fire, add one cup of dried beef cut into small pieces, and stir. Make a sauce from one and a half cup of milk, two tablespoons of butter and one of flour. Cut into small, thin slices, one potato, one carrot and an onion. Fill baking dish in layers; hominy and meat, sprinkling of vegetables and a covering of sauce, repeating until all is used. Sprinkle each layer with salt and pepper, and the top with bread-crumbs. Cover and bake one hour; remove cover and brown.

POTATO RABBIT.—Put one half cup of milk into a double boiler and when scalding hot add three tablespoons of butter, a little cayenne pepper, one half teaspoon of salt and one cup of mashed potato. Cook about ten minutes and then add three quarters of a cup of cheese. Stir continually, and when the cheese is melted, spread on thin slices of buttered toast.

VEGETABLE ROAST.—Beat one egg, add one half cup of milk or cream, two thirds cup of toasted bread-crumbs, one half cup of chopped nut meats, one large carrot and potato cooked and mashed, one half cup of finely chopped celery, a little sage, and salt to taste. Mix well together, shape into a loaf and roll in toasted bread-crumbs. Bake nearly one hour.

where we would land with a country full of gentlemen who hold Mr. Best's ideas. As Poultney Bigelow says in his fine work, "Prussianism and Pacifism" (Putnam & Sons, New York), "Man becomes a pacifist through the security his fighting fathers have purchased." We must ever be ready to preserve what our fighting fathers bled to secure for us, and to hand that priceless heritage on to our sons. The world needs men, not quitters and slackers, and we can't breed men unless we have the proper material.

LEXINGTON, R. R. 4, TENN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Words cannot express my love and admiration for dear Uncle Charlie and his good works. My three boys also love him. My greatest ambition for them is to have them have as much sense, grit and courage as you have. Three cheers, Uncle, for your Americanism. Am enclosing a dime for your home fund and it may amuse you to know how I earned it. During the recent rain the water overflowed quite a distance beyond the bridge that spans the canal and I carried several people across on my back, one at a time. When I returned home my wife was talking about you and I told her what I was going to do with that dime. Wife and children send best wishes and love to you.

Your admirer as ever, J. C. MAXWELL (JIM).

Jim, I was deeply touched with your letter and highly entertained and amused by the way you gathered in that dime. I would give worlds if I could have a snapshot of you ferrying the young and old ladies, the chickens and the hens across the river on your back. The one thing that worries me is that back ofyours. I once started to carry my mother-in-law across a stream. She only weighed about two hundred and forty pounds, and when I got into the middle of the stream, I discovered I had a terrible and most powerful pain in the back, and as I did not want to be burdened with a broken back as well as a mother-in-law, I just accidentally had to let her slip. There was an awful splash when she hit the water and I have never seen her since. My one regret is that I did not make her pay in advance for getting her halfway across that river—and, too, she did hate water so. Jim, one thing is certain, you are no profiteer or you would not have converted yourself into a human ferryboat for just one dime. If you had only been infected with the universal grab bug, you could have made enough money to have bought all the real estate on Manhattan Island with all its palatial buildings thrown in. Risking your life for the sake of humanity is a noble deed, but you ought to have collected enough in advance to have taken care of yourself and family in case your kindness and heroism had resulted in a broken back. Maybe, however, Jim, all your passengers were trim little chickens, instead of corpulent old ladies, and you derived so much pleasure from carrying them in your arms or boosting them on your back that you felt you were indebted to them rather than they to you. Like yourself, Jim, I have been a burden bearer, and I broke my back at the job and, like a fool, I didn't try to collect before I shouldered the burden. Of course, it is all very well to say that we'll get our reward in heaven, but Christ understood business and told us that the laborer is worthy of his hire. So the next time a flood comes, you carry all the fat old ladies across and if you don't soak them, soak their pocketbooks, and I'll carry the chickens across for nothing. It is a good thing that the young ladies have decided to be chickens instead of ducks or they might fool us both and swim over. Anyway, Jim, hug that bridge every time it looks like rain. Charge ten dollars a pound for transportation and fifty dollars a pound for all human freight that weighs over two hundred pounds. That will make some of the fat ones reduce and it will make them all produce, and it is production we want and must have. I am not going to let you do the Noah's Ark stunt for me unless you charge your passengers a reasonable rate. If you want liniment for your back, Jim, I will supply it. Meanwhile, accept my love, gratitude and appreciation for risking your life for a fellow-being.

MENTOR, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl of twelve and can make up pretty good poems but this one is the best. We have read COMFORT for years and I have always been interested in your letters. We have all your books and think them fine.

WHEN THE WAR IS OVER.

I am glad the war is over and the boys are safely home,
They always have something to tell us about and think when they're alone.
They spend most of their evenings talking about something they did in the war
And tell us about what they did to the Fritzies to make all the Fritzies sore.
The boys will tell of the French girls and tell of the Belgians too,
But the ones they all stick to are the ones in red, white and blue.

Your niece, LIZZIE ———.

Lizzie, I want to give notice to you and all others who desire letters published in this department that only those which bear the writers' signatures will be published. If you have not courage enough to sign your name to a letter, don't write it, as half the interest evaporates when the writer's name is not given. Cowards, traitors, Bolsheviks and Huns, who spew their venom through the mails and do not sign their names for fear of the law, of course are in a class by themselves. Poor crazy boobs, they think when they do not sign their names to treasonable matter, they cannot be located. Many an ingrate who has exploited this country for fat profit has hugged that delusion to his soulless bosom, only to find to his sorrow into what dangers that delusion had drawn him. No one needs to fear that his or her name will be published when it is attached to a matter of a nature that might draw upon the writer the wrath of relatives or neighbors. Letters should be signed as a guarantee of good faith. Your confidence is a sacred trust. All the boys did not come home, Lizzie. The boys who sleep in the soil of France are those who have the greatest story to tell, but it will not be told in this world. However, their sleeping bodies speak to us with an eloquence greater than can ever be tongued by those who survive the carnage of that conflict. Please ring me up and tell me when the boys get to that part of their adventure regarding just what made the Fritzies sore. Blowing Fritz to pieces with a shell only makes him mad, sticking a bayonet into him merely makes him uncomfortable; a dose of poison gas scarcely inconveniences him, spraying him with liquid flame only gets him hot around the collar—but there were some things that really and truly did make Fritzie sore. One was depriving him of his beer, another thing that got his goat was when he captured one of our tanks and found there was no booze in it; but the thing that drove him to madness, I've yet to tell. It was customary for the military to send up huge observation balloons from which Fritzie's movements could be observed. These balloons were called sausage balloons, owing to their close resemblance to the bologny with which Fritzie is so fond of upholstering the vast recesses of his enormous weinerwurst receptacle. To make the resemblance still more complete, the officers manning these balloons used to bark, and Fritzie's gastric juices began to jazz and rag until he felt sore all over. He did not mind being peppered with shrapnel while he was hiking out of Belgium and scooting out of the Argonne, but visions of that sausage were more than he could stand, and, as he was too sore to sit, poor Fritzie, his brains seething with visions of sissidge, was on the horns of a terrible dilemma, and it is not comfortable to sit on horns—see the point? I know that our boys stick to the red, white and blue. The red cheeks, the white powder and the blue-black penciled eyebrows. Just what they do when a well-washed face comes along, history does not divulge, but if there was any of the mucilage of love around they would probably stick to that, too, for, whatever else may be said about the American doughboy, he is some sticker, and you, Lizzie, are some "pot"—excuse me, poetess.

CENTER VIEW, MO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am fifteen years old, have brown eyes, black hair and weigh 112 pounds. I live on a farm and go to the country school, two miles southwest of where I live. My teacher is very cross, I don't like her teaching at all. Uncle, what makes teachers who get their education at the same school buildings in our county seat teach different? This my ninth teacher and she teaches different than any other teacher I ever went to. I am in the seventh grade. With love to all,

MISSOURI GIRL.

Girlie, you seem to be having lots of trouble, and whether that trouble is with you or your teachers, and it is possibly and probably more with you than with them, I cannot state definitely unless you and the nine teachers hop on a fast freight and let me subject you all to the usual tests, requisite for forming a decision on such a vital and important matter. After all, the trouble might not be with either the teachers or yourself. Maybe there is a tack in the county seat and the poor things have sat on it so long they have got cranky. Everybody's cranky, anyhow. Then, too, perhaps the building in which the teachers were educated may have rheumatism of the roof and defective lungs and diabetes of the stove-pipes. Anyway, one thing is certain, if you are expecting all teachers, even though they have imbibed their knowledge from the same identical source, to be all alike in their looks, manners and methods, personalities and temperaments, you are looking for the impossible. According to the Bible, only one man was created, the rest of us "just growed" like Topsy of Uncle Tom's Cabin fame. Men are not born equal and never will be. You are already old enough to have noted that the outstanding fact of life is that everything and everybody differs, especially on politics, though maybe we are all agreed that politics is—oh, well, just rotten—and Missouri has done its best to make politics what they ought not to be. In Ethnology we have the white, brown, black, red and yellow races. The only equality that exists or ever will exist is in the graveyard. The sands on the seashore are almost identical because they are dead, but when it comes to living things, billions of blades of grass and leaves, you will find they all differ, and so humans differ. In Russia they are trying to destroy individuality, personality, spirituality, and reduce all men and women by gun and sword, to one dead level of commonplace mediocrity. As long as your teachers are alive you will find each one differs in a thousand ways from the others. If, however, your teachers are incompetent, as some of them doubtless are, the fault lies with the fool county authorities, who, though they realize that a bricklayer is worth ten dollars a day, think a teacher is dear at ten cents, and we shall never have good teachers until they are decently paid. Education should be in the hands of the Federal authorities. It's too tremendously important a matter for muttonheads to deal with. Here is a legitimate field for government action. The teaching profession should be the best paid of all professions, and those who do not understand the art of imparting knowledge, inspiring their pupils with the desire to learn and to grow physically, mentally and spiritually, should be thrown out, no matter how well educated they may be. Sorry I can't come down to Missouri and be your teacher, but undoubtedly the first things I would butt into would be a bunch of Missouri Congressmen and the Missouri mule, and as I am not enamoured of either, I had better stay home.

EASTON, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am writing to ask your advice, which is always excellent. I am seventeen years old and will start my third year of high school this fall. I am five feet one inch tall and weigh about ninety pounds. I have dark hair and blue eyes. I live in the country and love it. I do not like town life, though I have never lived in town. What do you think would be a good occupation to take up when I leave school? I love housework and imagine I would like to be a stenographer, but many tell me it is not the place for a decent girl. Why can't a decent girl work there the same as any other? I hope to take up typewriting this year.

Your loving niece, MEARLE ASHWORTH.

Mearle, if you want to take up a real, worthwhile profession, take a course of domestic science and an extra long course of cooking. Any fool can be a stenographer, but only about one person in ten thousand knows anything about cooking, which is much more essential to the health and welfare of humanity than painting, sculpture or music. You are like most girls, several pounds underweight. We need well nourished girls of good physique to keep the race from degenerating and especially do we need that type of real girl now for such diseases as the flu are liable to hang about for years. This is a land of plenty—too much of plenty when it comes to the painted stenographer and the home that is cookless, yet so far as food is concerned, people are starving to death because they don't know what to eat or how to cook it when they get it. Highly polished rice, white bread made out of patent, highly milled flour deprived of all mineral salts and the vital life-giving elements, are about as nutritious as rocks. Milk, whole wheat flour, eggs and all the green vegetables you can get hold of, alone constitute a proper nourishing diet, a diet that would keep you out of the grave. More of this some other time. With the exception of two young ladies, all the Billy Goats that we ever had did not know how to set a table, and as for cooking, their attempts were not only pitiful but at times disgusting. "Mother did all the cooking," they say. Well, if mother's cooking was no better than daughter's, both of them ought to be thoroughly spanked. With food murderously high, food which it has taken the farmer infinite pains to raise, and which his wife too often takes infinite pains to spoil, to have this food destroyed by an incompetent idiot who demands fifty dollars a month and who calls herself a cook and who knows no more of cooking than a cinch bug knows of astronomy, and who costs you another fifty to house and maintain, and who can't handle one dish without breaking seventeen, is a crime that ought to be punished by imprisonment or the hangman's rope. And, by the way, I find the farmer's daughter knows no more about cooking than the city girl. The hen does her best, the hog, the steer and the sheep do their best; nature pushes up the vegetables and does her best; all nature does its best; and then Ma or dear daughter, who have a hundred cook books and a thousand magazines which devote large sections of space, full of beautiful illustrations, to the noble culinary art, spoil every blessed thing they get their incompetent hands on, and make chronic dyspeptics of an entire family. Cancer and other diseases are increasing by leaps and bounds and this is largely due to bad cooking and the lack of the most elementary knowledge of the proper preparation and selection of food stuffs. The world is dying for the lack of good cooks. You know what terrible revelations resulted when the soldiers were overhauled by draft board surgeons—about

INFANT'S BONNET IN ROLL STITCH.

Guestroom Towels

So thoughtfully do we now provide for "the stranger within our gates" that we even have a special brand of towels for her, or his, use dignified by the name of guestroom towels.

These are usually smaller than the ordinary towels, as they are only intended for face and hands and to be supplied fresh each day.

One special point about them is, that they can be made up in almost an endless variety of ways. Sometimes they are fringed, but more frequently they are scalloped or hemmed, but in any case this is only the beginning and in addition one can use a crocheted or tatted insertion, an embroidered or cross-stitch design with an initial or monogram. An all white monogram, if one wished it, would be out of harmony, if made of too light a stitch, as the raised work of the letters is solid.

When towels are designed for a room which has a certain prevailing tone, they should be of colors which will blend nicely.

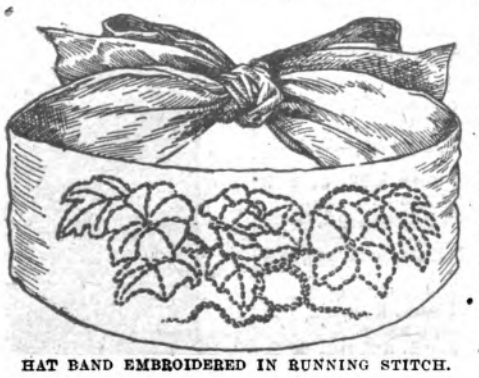
NEXT to food economy comes the mother's problem of how to keep the family decent and tidy when the prices of clothing are way out of reach of most purses. However, we feel that comfort is in sight when we read and observe that the American women are following the lead of our English sisters in outwitting the profiteers by refusing to buy unnecessarily until prices drop. At an enthusiastic meeting of the Housewives' League in Portland, Maine, it was voted that an old clothes club league be formed, its members to bind themselves to wear their old clothes, and to darn and mend, even to patching, until the prices are lowered. As a result of this individual rebellion, as I shall call it, one feature stands out with due prominence; which is, that cotton stockings have replaced the perishable silk ones, and that strong, serviceable, low-heeled boots are worn instead of the high-heeled, short-lived ones, to no small degree.

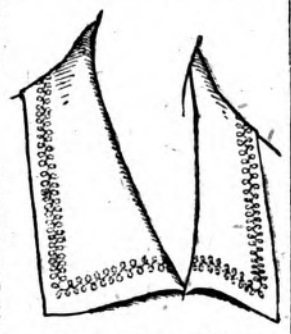


Extravagant dressing is on the wane, for American women of the type that we would follow, even blindly if necessary, have established the doctrine of clothing conservation, and are buying strong, durable materials of conservative color and design, and the pattern houses will today tell you that the sale of patterns for home dressmaking has practically doubled since the prices of everything we wear has more than doubled. But the real victory is in the fact that women are not mourning over their economies, and are minimizing the extra labor involved by having only the clothes necessary to comfort and neatness of appearance. "Display" is disappearing, thanks to the good sense of American women.

The community clubs are working wonders and spreading the gospel of common sense in spending and dressing more than any other form of organization. I wish that every neighborhood, if ever so small, would form a "getting together" club, for it is the exchange of ideas that is so helpful. And let me whisper that you need not stop at clothing, for by comparing notes, and reporting individual experiences, you will be led to demand clean food and honest weights and measures where you leave your money.

In questioning a community club member not long ago, I asked her from what source, as a club, they received the most help, and in reply she stated that it was through the family magazines. She further explained that at meetings, after business matters were disposed of, each member present quoted some useful "hint" she had read, and would follow it by some personal experience or suggestion. This procedure, she said, always opened up profitable discussions relative to every branch of home-making and housekeeping. My informant also remarked that the progress in the women's departments of their community and county fairs was sufficient testimonial of their success.

Start by Buying Right



First, do not buy at random, but rather know exactly what wear a garment will receive, how much material it will require, and, lastly, how much money can safely be allotted to this particular purchase. Remember that "something just as good" for less money is worth investigation if you know values. Gingham wears better than any other material for its weight; and for this reason is more economical, even at a higher cost, than print. Khaki is practical material for something heavier, and if a package of dark brown dye is prepared and bottled to be used to color the rinse-water, it can be kept its natural color without streaks. Rinse several times and then soak in the colored water about one hour. Khaki is an excellent material for children's wear, and is stylish for a hard-service material for grown-ups. Corduroy is another good "buy" and when interlined will often take the place of wool.

HAT BAND EMBROIDERED IN RUNNING STITCH.

An excellent way to ascertain the amount of material to be used is by placing the pattern on a newspaper cut the width of cloth to be purchased, to see if a saving cannot be made by rearranging pattern after all the calculations of changes have been made. Usually a saving is made over the amount specified in pattern directions by finding the skirt and sleeves need not be as long, and less material need be left below the waist line of waists. Examine your pattern illustration, for usually there are variations that change the necessary amount of material. For instance, where both long and short sleeves are illustrated, the specified amount of material will be for the long sleeves, but if your "want" is a short sleeve, you can save by suggested measurements. In these days a yard or more may be saved.

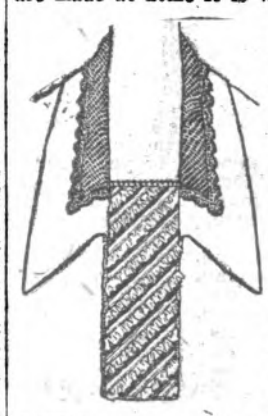
The one-piece dress still holds its place as leader for becomingness, easy-to-wear, and requiring less material and labor. And for the one "looking ahead" it certainly makes over to good advantage.

WAIST COLLAR TRIMMED WITH MACHINE STITCHING.

Stitches That Trim

One saving that fashion has accomplished is the use of fancy stitches and coarse embroidery as the sole trimming for dresses, blouses and skirts. These are mostly done with wools, and if a finer effect is desired, separate the strands. Hats have come in for this style of trimming, combining several bright colors in stitches and bunches of flowers. A favorite trimming is to embroider with wool, in "running" stitch, a large design of flowers and leaves in varied colors on a broad ribbon. The embroidery will come exactly in front, with the ends of ribbon tied in a bow at the back.

A "running" stitch is a pretty finish for collars and cuffs, whether they are made of cotton, net or silk. Another effective trimming is easily and quickly done as follows: Baste embroidery patterns to material, and if there is any danger of stretching, baste another paper underneath. Stitch the embroidery pattern on the machine, using for the top heavy sewing silk of the color desired, and fill the bobbin with cotton thread to match. The tension of machine should be tested before work is begun. Tear away the papers carefully and you will be pleased with the results.



Extending the Service of Clothing

It is quite the style to remodel clothing, and everyone is turning and making over good materials from men's coats to stocking legs. Not only do we save the price of new, but our "before-the-war" clothing still has more wear in it than the present new materials.

Combining different materials greatly extends our possibilities, for a skirt of one material, and blouse of another with touches of the skirt material for trimming, make a very useful all-round dress. And if a few pieces are left, cover an old but becoming hat with them to match, for it's the fashion. The new loose, bell sleeves are to be recommended, as a plain bias band or trimmed with fancy stitches is the only finish required, and they will not bind or tear out at the armhole.

Middy blouses for girls and children offer one of the most useful garments of the day. Old skirts that can be turned, or perhaps "dipped," are bound to make a middy for a small child. In the event of a plaited skirt, use two or four plaits at center front and back, pressing over a damp cloth to remove any creases that may be left from the remaining plaits. Wear the blouse with an inch-wide belt of same.

The unworn parts of old shirts also work into blouses, using part for part. Use collar and cuffs of a contrasting material. Where shirts are made at home it is wise to select materials in view to making the least worn parts to further service. The best values are in the regular shirtings. Select those with warp of even threads as they will not split. Striped and plain ginghams are also good values. Tiny garments such as rompers, creepers, bloomers, and waists to be worn under colored dresses, can be cut from old shirts, making a good saving.

RUFFLED VESTEE AND PLAIN COLLAR WITH OVER-COLLAR EDGED WITH LACE.

Economize on patterns by very carefully ripping and pressing old garments that fit satisfactorily and cut paper patterns from them. If a little larger size is necessary, widen the front and back by setting the pattern in from the edge or fold of cloth, but not too much, for by so doing the neck will be made too large. A sleeve may be lengthened by setting in the required amount in two places; half way between shoulder and elbow, and elbow and cuff. This keeps the elbow of sleeve in the right position which is necessary to make it fit well.

Two waists to one skirt is excellent economy. One plain, on the shirt-waist order, and the second for dressy occasions. I saw a most ingenious piece of work on this plan. An old medium-weight suit was the background, and was ripped, turned and sponged with great care. The skirt being too wide, a saving of material was thereby made; and, being too long, what was cut off made patch pockets and a belt. In recutting, a plain sport type of skirt was chosen, and a tailored waist to match. The coat sleeves were recut, and from wrist to elbow buttoned closely. The neck was low and square at the front, and finished with a straight plain silk collar cut from a strong portion of lining. The second waist was cut plain, and straight down each side of front from neck end of shoulder seam. The bell-shaped sleeves, vestee and collar were made from georgette to match, the vestee covered with narrow ruffles. A plain collar of net was edged with lace and worn over collar.

Do not lay aside little dresses made from flouncing because they are too short, but very accurately fold batiste or muslin and baste edges to the underside of scallops. From the outside, hem around each scallop so it will iron well, and on the wrong side sew securely, but with fairly loose stitch, back about one eighth of an inch. Trim away the cloth from the under side and you have simply made a good hem and a different style of flouncing.

It is often difficult to obtain a perfectly hanging skirt without assistance, but here is a plan that works satisfactorily. Put the skirt on and mark the desired length where the hem is to be turned. Next, stand in natural position against a table, and with pins or chalk mark all the way around where the material touches the table. Take off skirt and measure with your tape or yardstick the length between table marking to that where the hem is to be turned, and continue this measurement all around the skirt.

House slippers for each member of the family are one of the essentials, and pieces from old heavy coats for tops, and soles from old felt hats make durable soles. Several thicknesses of the felt, machine-stitched together, add to warmth and wear. If you lack a pattern for the top, use an old stocking, folding the sides flat together and cut by it. Use two thicknesses of cloth if it is thin and interline also. Bind edges with strong bias cloth.

Useful Odds and Ends

The worn-out cuffs of a man's shirt, joined together, make the right size and thickness for an ironing holder. Bind the edge.

In ripping snap fasteners from a garment, rip the corresponding snap and socket and snap them together. This saves oft wasted time in hunting for "mates."

In case the machine oil-can gives out, a medicine dropper will do equally good work in oiling all parts of the machine. Oil each end of the treadle frequently.

A creeping child will necessarily wear out stocking knees, but more or less of this can be prevented by knee protectors made from old stocking feet from which the worn heels and toes are cut. The tops of old long kid gloves are also excellent for this purpose. Fasten protectors over stocking with same supporter.

When children's stockings shrink in length, crochet a piece on the top.

Protect the baby's shoes, when rolling on the floor, by pulling old stockings over them.

Boys' ties can be made from ribbon ten inches long by four wide. Cut the ribbon lengthwise in two pieces. Sew to each end of a tape long enough to run under the collar but not to show in front. Turn in the edges and line. These make good school ties at small expense.

In repairing a "run" in lisle stockings, first sew over-and-over the sides of the run, going round the entire hole and taking care to put the needle back of where the run starts. When this much is accomplished, draw the edges together in herring-bone stitch, taking into the over-and-over stitch only.

A band of old fur sewed to the inside of a child's school coat is a great protection against cold winds. Lamb's wool is equally good.

To finish children's waists, nightdresses, etc., crease a narrow hem and crochet into the cloth, thus holding the hem in place. It makes a pretty finish, is durable and quickly done.

In making over fur, with a sharp-pointed knife, cut through from the skin side, and then sew the two even edges together. Not a bit of the fur is lost in this way, and it will match perfectly.

Sew a piece of thick flannel around the arm of your machine and use for a pincushion.

For a traveling kimono, large pockets to hold necessary toilet articles for use in the dressing-room are a convenience, inasmuch as they avoid the necessity of laying articles down in soiled places, and, besides, in this way they will not be left behind.

For sewing on shoe buttons, use a three-sided, straight carpet needle, as it acts as its own awl in pushing through the leather.

Do not machine stitch across seams in hemming skirts, but sew by hand, and it is well to do this first.

When darning frayed edges, turn cloth on the wrong side and carefully whip the two edges together, taking care not to draw them. Turn and darn from the right side.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Differential Construction

As explained in the previous issue, the purpose of a differential is to enable one of the driving wheels to revolve slower than the other driving wheel, a condition which is necessary when turning corners, etc. Several forms of differentials have been brought out of late years but we will explain the principle of the one which is to be found in the majority of cars and trucks. There are two types of rear axles, viz., the live and dead forms. The dead type is found mostly on trucks, and, as the name would imply, its purpose is to carry the rear wheels and does not revolve to drive them. A differential is used with this type of axle but usually it is mounted on the countershaft and chains run from the countershafts to the rear wheels. The internal gear drive includes the carrying of the rear wheels on a dead axle and a countershaft secured to the dead axle so that it is possible to drive the rear wheels by gears attached to the ends of the countershafts.

However, we will limit this discussion to the live axle found in the present-day passenger model, and once the principle of operation is grasped it will be an easy matter to decipher other forms.

DIFFERENTIAL OF THE LIVE REAR AXLE TYPE.

With this type, each rear wheel is driven by a separate axle shaft. At the inner end of each axle shaft, a bevel gear is keyed and pinned or fastened in some manner that it becomes practically integral with the shaft. The differential casing entirely encloses the bevel gears at the inner ends of the axle shafts and also carries a set of bevel pinions which engage with the bevel gears on the axle shafts. On the outside of the differential case, a large bevel-driven gear, many times referred to as a ring gear, is securely fastened. This large ring gear engages with a bevel driving pinion which is, in turn, coupled with the driving shaft.

Now that we have named the parts entering into the construction, let us learn what action takes place. We stated above that the bevel pinons which are carried by the differential casing are engaged with the bevel gears at the inner ends of the axle shafts. It is now evident that the pinions would be prevented from turning on their studs as long as both wheels were traveling forward or backward at the same rate of speed. However, jack one rear wheel free from the floor, start the engine and engage a gear (high for example); you will notice that the wheel which is jacked free from the floor will revolve while the wheel which is resting on the floor will remain stationary.

This is due to the drive following the lines of least resistance, and the action is as follows: the bevel pinions carried by the differential casing turn on their axles and run over the bevel gear teeth which are stationary and drive the gear for the wheel which is jacked from the floor.

The same action occurs when the car turns a street corner. The inner wheel, of course, does not stop but it revolves at a very slow speed. The pinions, however, operate on the principle outlined above. Remember that as long as the resistance is the same for both rear wheels, the pinions remain stationary and drive each wheel at the same rate of speed. When the resistance upon one wheel is greater than that for the other, the pinions commence to revolve upon their axles and give the drive to the wheel offering the least resistance.

During the past few years, differentials have been introduced which insure the drive to the wheel giving the most resistance. The advantage claimed for this type is that traction is always insured. For example, should one rear wheel rest on mud and the other on dry ground, the wheel on dry ground would get the drive and no difficulty would be experienced in obtaining traction. With the type of rear axle we have described, it would give the drive to the wheel in the mud, since it is on a slippery surface and would offer the least resistance.

Trailers

Quite frequently the individual or a company will possess a truck which develops sufficient power to haul a very large load and yet at times, due to not harnessing the vehicle in the proper manner, there will be loads it will not handle. A manufacturer rates his trucks at 2-3-4-5 tons or whatever the capacity may be. This does not mean that 2-3-4 or 5 tons is the limit of the truck's hauling power. Its real significance is the carrying power. The manufacturer figures the springs, frame, etc., to stand a certain tonnage for the road conditions, and therefore cautions the owner against loading the truck beyond that capacity.

For a minute, let us turn to the railway business as an example of the point to be brought out. Everyone has seen a locomotive hauling a long string of loaded freight cars. It requires no logic to grasp the thought that the locomotive could not haul the cars if they were piled one on top of the other on it. The weight of the loaded cars would crush the locomotive and render it scrap iron. However, keep the weight off the locomotive and it will haul the cars to their destination. This is an example of mechanical power and the same is true of the human. Try to carry a few hundred pounds on your back and you will not go far. Place the same few hundred pounds in a cart and you can pull it with comparative ease. The point to be brought out is that a piece of machinery or the human can pull a load many times that which he can carry.

A certain lumber company in central Michigan is compelled to haul their logs 20 miles over country roads to their mills. They have in service a small fleet of five-ton trucks, each one of which is equipped with a four-wheel trailer. When a full load of logs is taken on there is a weight of about 17 tons. The front end of the logs rest on the truck body directly over the rear axle and the trailer rests a trifle back of the center of the logs. In this manner the load is split up between the truck and the trailer and the load is moved with ease. Trailers have and are doing much to solve haulage problems.

One performance worthy of mention is the hauling of a steel still by a refining company in Wyoming a distance of 50 miles. By the use of a five-ton truck and two trailers coupled together, it was possible to make the trip in 19½ hours while it had required 36 horses and 10 men 30 days to haul a still of the same dimensions over the same route.

Some Useful Pointers

Overheating Battery

A storage battery can be damaged by overcharging as well as under-charging. Many cars are equipped with automatic cut-outs to take care of such a condition but when considerable day and but little night driving is done, it will be well to take frequent tests of the storage battery. If the reading is high, switch the lights on a few hours during the day, until the battery reading reaches normal. Many manufacturers recommend that the lights be turned on when the cars are driven overland from the factory. This is to keep the amperage down as the battery is fully charged when installed and does not require a steady charge for a number of hours which it would ordinarily receive on the drive away.

Spring Clip

The object of spring clips is not only to hold the springs firmly to the axles but also to prevent movement of the springs between the clips. Breakage of springs at the center is usually due to loose clips. There is a tendency for the spring clips to stretch and, thereby, loosen when the car is new. It is, therefore, good policy to tighten the clips every week when the car is new and later to inspect them at least once a month.

Questions Answered

MAKE AND BREAK TO JUMP SPARK.—I want to change the ignition system of a two and one half h.p. gasolene engine from low to high tension. Can I replace the make-and-break igniter with a spark plug? Would any other part of the engine need to be changed?

L. O. M., B. 3, Bardwell, Ky.

A.—In all probability it will be practical for you to install a high-tension magneto and install a spark plug in the cylinder. However, before going to any expense, why not write to the engine manufacturer and tell him about your plans? He undoubtedly will be in a position to advise you or furnish prints showing how the change should be made.

LEAKS OIL, NEEDS NEW GASKET.—Is it possible to make a chemical cell from the zinc and carbon of an old dry cell? Recently I renewed the transmission bands of my 1916 Ford, and when I did so I neglected to renew the gasket under the cover, and the oil leaks out. At first it leaked quite badly, but it has nearly stopped leaking now. Will it stop or leak worse?

H. G. M., Raton, N. Mex.

A.—The writer has never learned of anyone having converted a dry cell battery into a wet battery. He assumes that this is what you have reference to when you specify "chemical cell." The dry cell relies upon chemical action for its operation, and, therefore, in reality is a chemical cell. The ordinary dry cell consists of a zinc shell lined with absorbent material such as blotting paper. This paper is saturated with the electrolyte. The space between the paper and the carbon or positive pole in the center is filled with powdered carbon and manganese oxide which serves as a depolarizing agent. Regarding the leaking of oil because you failed to renew the gasket, we believe that the leaking is gradually stopping because all the oil has leaked out. By all means, renew the gasket.

Grandma Knows Musterole Is Best

Remember the time when you had that dreadful congestion of the lungs—and Grandma slapped a stinging, messy mustard plaster on your chest? How you writhed and tossed and begged Grandma to "take it off"?

That was many years ago. Now, Grandma gets the jar of Musterole, for now she knows Musterole is better than a mustard plaster.

She knows that it relieves colds, congestions, and rheumatic aches and pains.

And what is best, it relieves without discomfort or blister.

Musterole is a clean white ointment made of oil of mustard and other home simples.

Just rub it gently over the spot where there is congestion or pain. It penetrates down under the skin and generates a tingling, pleasant heat. Healing Nature does the rest. Congestions and pains both go away.

Peculiarly enough, Musterole feels delightfully cool a few moments after you have applied it.

Never be without a jar of Musterole.

Many doctors and nurses recommend it. 30c and 60c jars. $2.50 hospital size.

Pheasants and Pigeons

POULTRY people who have been keeping pheasants as a side line must look sharply after eggs from now on, because pheasants will lay in any sheltered corner on the ground rather than in any made nest, and the male birds are really cannibals. If they catch sight of an egg they devour it immediately, so it is well to sneak round the yards, locate the nests, and steal the eggs as frequently as possible. Pheasants are never very good setters or mothers, especially in captivity, so the best plan is to use a bantam or small Leghorn hen to set the eggs under. When you have stolen nine eggs, get a box a foot square, turn it on one side, and across the bottom of the open front nail a slat, behind which place a nest of soft hay. Stand this nest box inside (at one end) of another box two and a half feet long, with sides a foot or more deep. Make a cover of half-inch mesh wire netting, for the large box, to open like a lid. Scatter sand on the floor, nail up a small drinking pan in one corner, and you have a safe, rat-proof coop for Biddy and the eggs. Another motive for the outer box is that baby pheasants are so very little, so wild, and so easily frightened, that they are apt to quit the nest as soon as hatched, get lost, become chilled, and die.

It takes from twenty-five to twenty-six days to incubate eggs of the English or Ring-necked variety. The brood coop to be used the first two weeks should be on the same principle as the nest boxes, and even when they are on the grass-run you must exercise the greatest caution to avoid anything like cracks or crevices in or around the sides, for they are such mites, and have such capacity for getting through the eyes of needles, that special care is necessary. If some knothole or some depression in the ground has escaped your vigilance, and a baby does stray off, go about two yards away and remain perfectly still. Don't be impatient. It may be ten minutes before you hear anything. Then, unless all hope is over, you will hear a plaintive little cry. Do not move until it has been repeated three or four times, and you are quite sure where it comes from. Then make a sudden dive and secure the truant, which is usually under a tuft of grass or in some little hole. If you move about while hunting for him, there won't be a sound, and you may hunt all day with little success.

WYANDOTTE HEN, A GOOD BUILD FOR EGG PRODUCTION.

Feed for Young Pheasants

Give the usual nothing for twenty-four hours; then stale cornmeal bread, crumbled (half a cupful), one tablespoonful of silver sand, one tablespoonful of crushed mustard seed, one teaspoonful of maw seed (poppy seed), one hard-boiled egg chopped fine. Mix all together and feed every two hours between 6 A. M. and 4 P. M. for three days, after which milk curds, crushed wheat, pinhead oatmeal, chopped lettuce, green onions and boiled liver can be added to the bill of fare.

A change of diet sharpens appetite, so use discretion in alternating the latter dainties. Meat, vegetables or fruit are all necessities to these birds, and when possible should be supplied in the more natural form of grubs, insects and berries. Ants' eggs are among their favorite foods, and are easily obtained by digging into the middle of an ant hill. Meal grubs can also be created by slightly moistening meal, then keeping it in a moderately warm place.

After the eighth week, cracked corn, wheat, barley, Kaffir corn, rape—in fact, all the small grains, are staple food for the rest of their lives, and can always be left before them in self-feeding boxes, for they are not gluttons and never eat too much.

Once a day a crumbly mash containing meat and green stuff of some sort should be fed if the birds are to be kept in good breeding condition.

The Demand for Pheasants

The demand for pheasants has been growing steadily for the last ten years, and it is safe to say that it will continue to increase, as the government has made very extensive experiments with the birds in different parts of the country, and is now convinced that the English pheasant is the best bird to take the place of native game birds, which have become so very scarce during the last ten years.

There are now several hundred small breeders in Massachusetts, Long Island, New Jersey and Connecticut, and in a recent report issued by the Commissioners of Fisheries and Game, we are told that the abundance of pheasants must depend on the many small breeders, because there are many more people who can breed a few pheasants in captivity than there are of those who can breed thousands, as they cannot be kept in large flocks like chickens.

At present the principal demand comes from the owners of large estates, and game clubs, and wealthy people who care to beautify their homes by erecting aviaries on their lawns and stocking them with the gorgeous varieties of pheasants, which are the Lady Amethyst, Golden, and Silver.

For stocking preserves and for game clubs, the varieties known as English and ring-necked are preferred, as their more somber coloring makes them less conspicuous when liberated in woodlands. Men and women living in the vicinity of wealthy homes would find it profitable to keep a pair of any one of the three ornamental varieties and sell their progeny for aviaries, and a trio of either English or Ring-necked will give them a good start, with the more plebian birds for stock and market.

Pigeons for Profits

Where pigeons are kept for squab raising, it is one of the most profitable ventures in which suburbanites or real country folk can embark. The young are ready for market when four weeks old; a good pair of mature birds will raise two squabs every four weeks for nine months in the year which means that each pair of old birds should provide one and one half dozen squabs, which will market for four dollars and fifty cents. The cost of keep is supposed to be fifty cents a year, but even allowing one dollar a year, there should be three dollars and fifty cents clear profit.

These estimates are made on good homer pigeons, well housed and cared for; not common nondescript birds, leading a half-wild existence, with only old-fashioned shelter behind a row of holes high up in a barn, where the nests are exposed to every storm; besides which, the young of mongrel pigeons only weigh five or six ounces when four weeks old, and are so scrawny and unappetizing that they are difficult to market at any price, whilst homers at any age weigh from twelve to twenty ounces, and are white skinned and plump. The mature homers will cost about two dollars a pair from any of the recognized lofts.

Drinking fountains and feeding boxes into which the birds can only get their beaks are imperative for pigeons, for they are most particular, and will not take defiled food or drink unless positively starved into it. Yet, if they have open feed and water boxes, they will scatter the contents all over the floor. There is a galvanized iron feeding box costing one dollar on the market, which has seven openings, so that many birds can feed at the same time. Water fountains of the same material are virtually indestructible, and cost only fifty cents.

The yard and fly must of course be entirely closed for pigeons, and should be four feet higher than the front of the house so that the birds can use the roof for a sun parlor. We use four-by-four joists, cut into twelve-foot lengths, for the front of the house, as they can be nailed to the house and need not be sunk into the ground as those at the side and far end must be. The joists for the sides and end are cut into thirteen and one half foot lengths, which allows a foot and a half to go into the ground. These measurements allow the use of four-foot netting without any waste. For a house twelve feet long, I think the yard should be at least fifty feet. Erect several perches at the far end of the yard, a platform about two feet wide and four feet long on legs three feet high in the center of the yard for the bathtubs to stand on. Pigeons must have a bath, for cleanliness is a necessity; a pan about two feet square and four inches deep is the best size, and they can be bought in galvanized iron for one dollar each.

Red wheat, Kaffir corn, cracked corn, Canadian field peas, German millet and hemp seed are all appropriate for pigeons. They should be alternated, or one or two mixed together. Of course, sometimes one grain is cheaper than another, or easier to get in certain districts, but don't use any one grain exclusively. Pigeons must have variety.

We follow the rations recommended by W. E. Rice, a very experienced pigeon raiser. Morning: Equal parts of cracked corn, Kaffir corn and wheat. Evening: Cracked corn and Canadian peas. These regular meals are put into feed boxes in quantity sufficient to insure the birds having a constant supply. Treats which we feed at odd times, such as millet, hemp and rice, are thrown on the ground, for, as they are only fed in comparatively small quantities, they are eaten up at once, and so there is no danger of their being spoiled. Remember always to buy red, not white wheat, for the latter is very apt to cause diarrhea.

Cleanliness is even more imperative in the pigeon house than in the henhouse. Never neglect to scald out the earthenware nest and whitewash the compartment it stands in, every time squabs are removed for market, for it is only by such rigid system that the place can be kept in sanitary condition. Pigeons must have shell, salt and charcoal to be healthy, so there should be a self-feeder with three compartments in each house. When ordering, specify that the oyster shell is for pigeons, as it is to be broken up smaller than for the hens. The rock salt and charcoal should be ground to about the size of rice. During the heavy breeding season we crush most of the grain, and always peas, for when the parent birds are rushed for time between their two nests, they are very liable to pick up whole grain and feed it to the young birds before they are able to digest it. Before we discovered this carelessness, we often found a dead squab in the nest. The feed boxes can be kept filled up, as pigeons never overeat, and must have access to food at all times when they have young ones to feed.

If you start with a few pairs of birds, the best way to increase the number is to sell the squabs and use the money to buy mature birds, for it takes two pigeons six months to reach maturity, and it is necessary to have two extra houses in which to keep the growing birds, as they should not be allowed to remain in the regular brood pen. If, however, you have specially mated birds and desire to raise their progeny, you must watch the nests, and as soon as the young ones get out on the floor (the old ones generally push them out when the eggs in the

Give Stomach What it Needs

The Alkaline Effect of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets Usually Corrects the Stomach Faults that Provoke Attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia.

To sit back after a good meal and know there is not going to be sour risings, gas, drowsiness and discomfort is the logical result of using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets immediately after eating. Most people believe they can trace each attack of indigestion to the something they ate and can still "taste." And it surprises them, invariably, to note how quickly relief comes after using one or two of these tablets. Whether it is highly seasoned food, rich pastry, the heavy hearty foods or some one particular offender the relief comes just the same. Those who are susceptible to attacks of indigestion or dyspepsia should try Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets as they supply the stomach with an alkaline effect just as it does naturally when it is working in a perfectly healthy condition.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are so widely known and used that you can get them in any drug store in the United States and Canada at 50 cents a box.

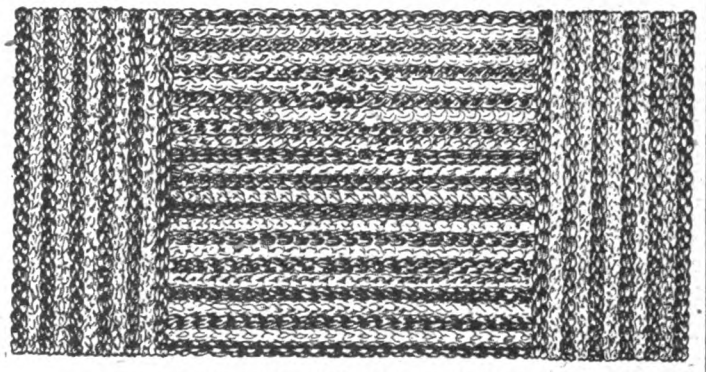
RUGS



MADE FROM WORN CARPETS AND CAST OFF CLOTHING

By Caroline Ellis

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

RUGS made from used and made-over materials have come into their own again in use and popular favor. The present values accorded all kinds of home-made floor coverings have caused the revival, in this age of advanced civilization of a primitive age practiced by all peoples from the most remote antiquity. These simple weaving processes which we find so beautifying and artistic were used, and are still used, by the savages, especially in the making of mats. And just as they still hold to the simple arrangement of fastening the warp between sticks driven into the ground, and in "darning" fashion worked the filling in and out by hand, so do we cling to the old-time hand-loom in making the home-made rag rug.

All through the ages there has been a tenacious holding on to hand processes. In point is one very recent example, when, during the great war, frames were introduced in some of the grade schools whereby mufflers could be made for the soldiers with greater accuracy and rapidity than with knitting needles. Who shall say that while these children were being taught patriotism by doing their "bit," that another equally important seed was not being sown from which ways of thrift and home making would spring? I saw a girl of ten years operating one of these frames and her delight and satisfaction would do credit to one of older years.

CROCHETED RUG OF "YARN" MADE FROM OLD STOCKINGS.

While we are essentially going to talk about things made at home, it is a boon to housewives that old clothing and worthless rugs and carpets can be "reclaimed" and made into floor coverings, instead of selling them as "rags" or in exchange for some commodity of small value, when every kind of textile has advanced in value until we "patch the patch."

Preparing Rug Materials

There is a tradition that Martha Washington carefully raveled her old silk dresses, reeled the thread into skeins, and dyed them, from which, with her own hands, she wove material for chair cushions. This is but an example in illustration of the value attached to the home-made furnishings. We could not, if we would, ravel the modern "silks," for they are so "weighted," adulterated, and "mercerized" that the old-time silk materials, probably the longest wearing fabric known, is practically a thing of the past.

Cotton strips to be woven should be torn, not cut, into lengths about one inch wide, this depending on the fineness of weave desired. No rule can be given for width of strips to be braided, as those of thin materials should be wider than heavy ones when used in the same braid.

The crocheted rug here illustrated was made from stocking legs. These were cut into strips about two thirds of an inch wide, by cutting lengthwise or round and round. The ends are sewed together by whipping back and forth. Over the edge of a table the strips are gently drawn back and forth so that the edges are evenly turned in, making a "yarn" which crochets or knits very prettily with a coarse hook or large needles. White stockings may be dyed to match furnishings of room. Old gauze or finely knit underwear can be worked in the same way, producing something of value from seemingly valueless material. The one shown was first made square and then ends were crocheted on.

If materials are to be dyed, it is very important that they be first thoroughly cleansed. Soft, and if possible, rain water should be used for cleansing, and this applies to dyeing as well. Many a dyeing process has failed simply because of some chemical impurity in the water used in mixing the dye. Prepared dyes are the safest for home use, and directions should be studied and carefully followed.

Some very handsome braids or stripes are made by dyeing plaids or checks, using a shade lighter than the darkest tone in the material. The popular hit-or-miss effect is still there, but the coloring has introduced a harmony that is well worth the labor of coloring.

We do not have to confine ourselves to floor coverings in utilizing our materials. Portieres, pillows, school bags, knitting bags and table covers are other articles that can be made from a few choice pieces. Old silk strips crochet or weave most effectively into table covers.

Saving at the Spigot and Wasting at the Bunghole

THERE is an economy that saves at the spigot and wastes at the bunghole. To practice economy in little things and forget it in the larger ones is no economy at all. To walk a mile in order to save five cents car fare may not be good policy, for the time may be worth many times the saving. It has been figured out that it does not pay a carpenter to stoop down to pick up a nail, for the time he wastes would buy two nails. You often see men and boys in the big city dashing in front of autos, dodging trolley cars and taking desperate chances with their lives to save a few moments' time, and then stop for ten or fifteen minutes to watch some gentleman in a window advertising a corn cure. Be consistent!

It never pays to buy something simply because it is cheap. If you do not need it, it is dear at any price. The woman who is eager for bargains and buys simply because she cannot resist the temptation to get a bargain has swindled herself. True value consists in getting the maximum return for the money spent.

Last summer a woman bought six baskets of peaches that were spotted, and thought she bought them cheap, and her economical soul was exultant; but when she found she had fewer cans than if she had bought sound fruit, and the scraps were useless for "peach butter," and in her anxiety to get them canned before they spoiled she worked herself sick and let the syrup boil until it crystallized, she realized that there are some bargains that are not bargains.

When a wave of economy strikes the household, the wife generally decides to save on the table, which is all very well, provided she knows how. But to buy cheap meats and stale vegetables may be the poorest sort of economy.

There are some cuts of beef as nourishing as porterhouse at one third less the cost; but to buy bone and gristle for beef is to deceive yourself. If the family eats no fat, buy lean cuts. Pork chops can be had with practically no fat or bone at all. These are the loin chops. Rump roast is all meat and no bone and goes a long way because there is no waste. In the matter of clothing costly economy can be practiced. Two pairs of two dollar shoes will not last half as long as one pair of four dollar ones. Gingham costs more than calico, but it wears longer and looks better. It costs just as much to make a dress of calico as of gingham and the only difference is the small saving in material cost, which is over-balanced by the short wear. A remnant is not cheap unless you can use it.

It may pay a woman to do her own laundry, but if she breaks her health it is costly washing. You can save money by doing without eating—at least cutting it down to stopping the craving for food. You can eat candy just before dinner and not want soup and meat; but that is saving money to hire a doctor. True economy does consist in doing without some things—needless luxuries, but not in doing without the necessities of life. There are many ways to save, but look out that in saving at the spigot you don't forget the bunghole.

second nest hatch) they can fend for themselves, and should be removed to a nursery house, where all food must be cracked to the size of rice for several weeks. When one desires to build up size and good points, it is necessary to have two nursery houses, and so be in a position to select the best birds from different parentage to mate.

To illustrate: The nestlings from one side of the house should go into Nursery No. 1, nestlings from the other side into Nursery No. 2. Our nurseries are only seven by ten feet, so we never have more than twenty birds in each, and they can be taken within a few days of each other, in this way making very little difference in age when it comes to mating time. When the younger ones in the nurseries are between six and seven months old, we take a bird from each and put them into a mating cage, which is really a coop, four feet long, two and one half feet deep, and two feet high, which is fastened up in one corner of the feed house. The coop is divided into two compartments by a wire netting door. A bird is put into each compartment. If they are male and female, they will commence within a week or two to coo and talk to each other through the wire, at which time the compartment is fastened up to the top of the cage, and they are allowed to have the run of the coop for three or four days, after which they are put into a regular breeding house, where they will soon take possession of the nest. If, however, the birds chosen simply ignore each other after they are put into the mating cage, one of them is removed to another cage, and two more birds are taken from the nursery house and put into the two compartments. In this way we go through the nests until we have them all paired.

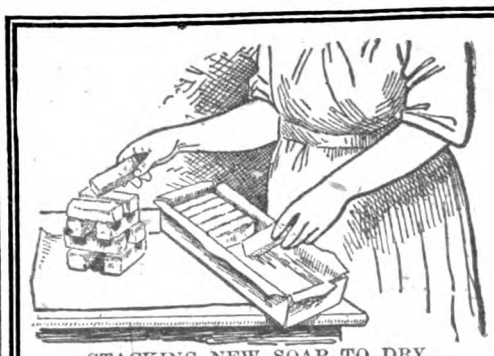
Correspondence

Subscribers are entitled to advice of our Poultry Editor, free, through the columns of this department. Address Poultry Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. BE SURE to give your full name and address, otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

E. E. S.—From the description you send I think the bird has bronchitis. Get some arsenite or antimony tablets, 1-1000 of a grain drug strength. Give four tablets between 7 A. M. and 5 P. M. each day until a cure is accomplished. Bronchitis is only an affection of the air tubes, so the other hens in the flock can safely be fattened and used for the table.

G. C. H.—There are so many good incubators on the market that it is quite impossible to single out the one that is best. Your best plan would be to find out what manufacturers have agents in your vicinity, so that you can look at the machines and select the one which appeals to you most.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Wheezing, and such symptoms of cold don't always mean roup. In an attack of roup, the eyes usually look watery, and the bird's body feels feverish to the touch. The mouth and nostrils show a deposit of mucous, and always there is the one unmistakable symptom belonging to true roup, which is the extremely disagreeable odor which can be noticed on the bird's breath. Open the beak of the sick birds, and examine their mouths and throats for a slimy looking discharge or a cheesy yellowish deposit, and then for the unmistakable odor of the breath. If that is not present, you may be sure that you have only a common cold, or, at worst, bronchitis, to fight. Please read answer to E. E. S. in this issue. If, however, the symptoms are those of roup, you must at once remove the sick birds from the rest of the flock, and keep them in a strict quarantine, for roup is very contagious, and will quickly spread through the flock unless you take drastic means to check its advance. After removing the sick birds, clean the chicken house, feed and water dishes, perches and nests, and use a strong disinfectant over all. Treat the sick birds as follows: Get ten cents' worth of permanganate of potassium from the drug store, dilute one teaspoonful of the flakes in a quart of water. For use, dilute a tablespoonful of the solution with two tablespoonfuls of water, then fill a small syringe and spray the birds' throats, nostrils and eyes three times a day. Following the syringe, use a wing feather. Strip it to within about an inch of the tip, then saturate it with the wash, and thoroughly swab out the bird's throat and mouth, which will answer almost as well as spraying.



N. M. C.—Turkey eggs can be hatched in an incubator, but the babies should be given to an old turkey or a motherly hen to brood, as turkeys still retain enough of their old nature to depend on a mother to scratch and show them food; at least, I have found that they don't do well in a brooder unless one takes time to scatter a few grains of food in front of them about every half hour. Food left in a dish does not seem to attract them at all.

F. MacF.—I have no price list, and I cannot recommend breeders in this column.

R. O.—As you are a subscriber, you will have received the February number of COMFORT before this. The poultry department in that number dealt with ducks and geese, and will answer your question more fully than I could in this column.

E. C.—Any drug or hardware store that keeps thermometers would be able to get you a hygrometer, or you can write to the Rochester Optical Company, Rochester, N. Y. Refer to the poultry department in the January number of COMFORT. It will give you the relative amount of heat and moisture necessary at STACKING NEW SOAP TO DRY.

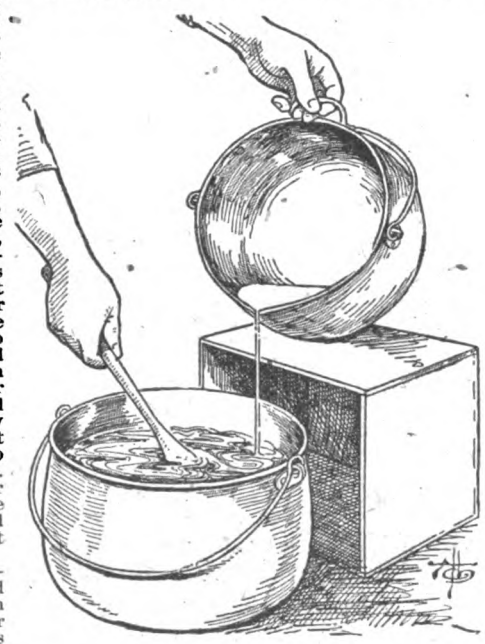
REVIVAL OF HOME SOAP-MAKING

—o—

By Ella Gardiner

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IN reply to my question, "Do you still make your own soap?" my neighbor expressed herself as follows: "Yes, but I make less, for I have learned how to clarify and deodorize more of my waste fats which makes them too valuable for cooking purposes to put into soap grease. However," she added, "we use soap now instead of wasting it as we did when I made so much." And to myself I said, "This is as it should be."



Soap making and soap saving is what we are going to talk about, but first let us touch on fat economy, which means a scrupulous avoidance of waste, not going without. As when we discuss every known commodity nowadays, we remark on the price, so will we say of fats, the price has put them in the class of luxuries, and the only way out is the road of economy.

When we refer to fats we mean cream, butter, butter substitutes, lard, fatty meats and fish, the vegetable oils, nuts, etc., and in the various processes of their use it is only through care that waste is prevented. After a greasy dinner, if one would take the pains to rinse each plate and the platters free from grease with a little clear hot water, save it and skim off the fat, they would be surprised at how far it would go toward a bar of soap. Children seldom care for fat meats and will leave them on their plate, and it is a waste to serve it to them.

We are told by scientists who have studied the effects of fat upon the body, that not over two and a half ounces of fat each day are necessary to health. It can be seen therefore that when milk and cream and good butter, a moderate amount of meat, cheese and meat are eaten, that it is a waste to use much fat in greasy frying, rich pastry, or adding too much fat to vegetables.

In greasing a griddle, use a piece of salt pork on the end of a fork instead of cooking the cakes in pools of fat.

Grease is wasted, and cake and biscuits often spoiled, by daubing the pans with too thick a coating.

STIRRING THE FAT INTO THE LYE.

Rendering and Clarifying Fats

Save all the trimmings, uncooked and cooked, and while fresh cut into very small pieces or put through food chopper. Add water to cover well and a little cooking soda. Slowly bring to a boil and cook until nearly all the water has evaporated. Strain through a wire sieve, add a sliced unpeeled raw potato, set into oven, and when the fat stops bubbling it is ready to strain and put into containers.

Use the same process for odd lots of grease. The cause of soap grease molding while it is being accumulated, for a "batch" of soap, is insufficient clarifying. In adding new fat to the savings, put the container into the oven and heat it all together. Mutton fat will make a superior quality of soap.

HARD SOAP, No. 2.—Dissolve one pound can of lye in one quart of cold water and let it cool. Stir occasionally with a smooth stick. Add in a fine stream six pounds of clarified melted fat, stirring continually. The fat must not be warm, and the best way to prepare it is by thoroughly melting and cooling to the point where it becomes "creamy," or semi-firm. Stir until thick and smooth and then pour into paper-lined boxes. Use waxed paper if convenient. Cut into bars before it becomes hard.

HARD SOAP, No. 2.—Dissolve one pound can of lye in one quart of cold water and let it stand until cool. Mix together two tablespoons of sugar, one teaspoon of salt and three tablespoons of borax, and then add one half cup of soft cold water and one quarter of a cup of ammonia. Stir this into the cool lye water, and then in a fine stream add five pounds of melted fat which is at the "creamy" consistency, stirring continually. Continue to stir until the whole mixture is thick and light colored. Line a box with dampened strips of cloth, pour in the soap, and when firm cut into bars.

SOFT SOAP.—Dissolve one pound of lye in three gallons of cold rain water, and when cool, slowly add four pounds of melted fat. Boil until the mixture becomes transparent and all the greasy appearance has disappeared. Add eleven gallons of boiling hot rain water, boil until thoroughly mixed, and set away to cool, when it should be the consistency of soft jelly.

TOILET SOAP.—Dissolve one pound can of lye in one quart of cold water and set to cool. Have ready five pounds of clear mutton tallow that is cold but not hard, and very slowly add it to the lye water, beating continually. Now while continuing the beating, add two tablespoons of ammonia, four ounces of glycerine, and a very little at a time, one half ounce of oil of lavender. When smooth and creamy, pour into papered boxes.

Oat Meal Soap from Soap Savings

Take bits of soap too small to use and shave fine. To one half cup of soap add one cup of boiling water, keeping it warm until dissolved. Into this mixture stir ground rolled oats, or oat meal, until it is the consistency of dough. Shape into round flat cakes and dry.

A pitcher of liquid soap from which a fine stream can be poured is a great saving of soap, as it does away, for hand-washing, with the frequent dipping of the cake into water, which so rapidly wastes it away. Liquid soap is simply made by melting soap in sufficient water so that when it cools it will be thin enough to pour in small quantities. Children take to this liquid soap very kindly. Try it.

Soap Paste for Grimy Hands

Make a mixture about the consistency of soft dough as follows: Melt soap in enough water so that it will be a soft jelly. To one cupful add one teaspoon of borax, two tablespoons of strong vinegar, three tablespoons of hot lard, and one tablespoon of fine pumice. Stir into this coarse corn meal. This is excellent for very soiled hands. It should be rubbed on while the hands are dry, and when the dirt seems to be removed, wash hands in warm soap and water.

Stains on the Table-Cloth

What to Do with Them

By Alice Lindsey Webb

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

PROVOKING? Of course it is! It is always the best damask table-cloth that gets the candle grease on it, for it is used for the birthday party, or the banquet when the candelabra are used. It is always the best cloth that gets the grease from the big "company" platter, when Daddy gets excited in carving the fowl and it slips; and the best cloth gets the cocoa spilled by little folk who "can't help it 'cause it was so hot."

All these make stains that are stubborn to get out, but may be managed easily enough when one knows just the trick. The candle grease, for instance, may be taken out readily by two methods. One may either put fresh white blotting paper above and beneath and press with a hot iron, which will melt the wax (and the blotting paper will take it up); or one may dissolve it slowly with gasolene or alcohol.

Blotting paper may be used for other kinds of grease than the candle wax, or the spot may be washed in cold water and soap, or powdered with French chalk (convenient if the cloth is otherwise perfectly fresh), and that will absorb the grease slowly.

Cocoa or chocolate stains should be washed first in cold water, and then boiling water poured through.

For coffee or tea stains, the boiling water should be poured through—the sooner the better. Many times a drop of medicine will make a bad stain. Alcohol or chloroform will dissolve most of these. The latter will remove iodine stains.

Wine stains may be treated as coffee stains, pouring boiling water through. If they do not yield, salt may be put on, more hot water poured through and the cloth laid in the sunshine. If the stain is made by a yellow wine instead of red, however, the cloth should be washed in cold water first, then with warm water and soap. If one happens to have on hand a solution of oxalic acid, one may put that on and hold the spot over a bowl of steaming hot water, then rinse at once in ammonia and afterward in clear water. Remember that oxalic acid is poison and keep it out of reach of children and where it will do no harm.

Often ink stains may be taken out in this same way. (Why will some people always forget to spread a newspaper before writing with ink on the dining table?) As inks differ greatly in their composition, it is sometmes hard to tell just what is best to remove the spot. One way is to moisten with lemon juice, sprinkle with salt, and hold over the bowl of hot water, then treat as in the case of the yellow wine.

Spring and summer usually bring fruit stains onto the table; yes, and in fall and winter there are the juices of canned fruits to stain. Alcohol will dissolve many of these. If they do not come out at once, boiling water should be poured through; or a little salts of lemon may be put on, hot water poured through, and the place rinsed first in ammonia and then clear water.

It is well, also, to know how to deal with mildew. A paste should be made of chalk, salt, soap and water, applied to the place, and the cloth left in the sunshine or on the green grass a while. Sometimes alcohol is effective with stubborn cases.

Scorch (oh! that careless laundress!) may occasionally be removed by merely leaving the cloth in the bright sun. If it doesn't come out then, it should be dipped in soapsuds, made good and strong, and put out in the sun again.

A GOOD FLORIDA (17c) LUNCHEON

Along about Christmas time a little town in Florida held a Farmers' Rally, and the Clubwomen were able to give the 500 persons in attendance a splendid Noon-luncheon, according to press reports—for 17 cents per plate. Most of the articles appearing on the Menu were home-grown.

The High-Cost-of-Living today is bearing down most heavily on salaried folks—office managers, clerks, professional men, and others of that class. According to Bradstreet's, living costs stood last December at 131 per cent above pre-war level. Profiteering, extravagance and inflation of the currency all have their effect, but the real, fundamental, underlying cause of our troubles is UNDER-PRODUCTION.

Florida growers, however, need worry but little about their own living costs, when you consider the big prices they receive for luxuries shipped north in mid-winter. The Christmas strawberries brought them from 90c to $1.00 and as high as $1.46 per quart, after shipping and selling expenses were paid. In December Green String Beans brought close to $6.00 per hamper in New York. Tomatoes shipped to Northern markets brought $2.75 to $4.00 per crate, and Peppers $3.25.

The Leesburg Commercial states: "We visited a twelve-acre farm Saturday—ten acres in fruit and the crop sold on the trees this season for $10,000 cash. Cost of production was $1,100, leaving $8,900 for interest on the investment—nearly 18 per cent on a value of $5,000 per acre."

These are not "Pipe Dreams"; they are Florida Facts. Grove land that is at present in an uncultivated state will not last forever in Florida—note the lesson of California. I own and am offering for sale in Orange County some of the finest orange and trucking lands in the state.

Truck gardeners near Orlando cleared as high as $1,500 an acre from head lettuce last year. We have copies of their signed testimonial letters in our book. Many of these truck gardeners are Northern men and they know our summer climate is cool and more pleasant than in Northern states.

Here is OPPORTUNITY reduced to its simplest terms. All you need is a moderate amount of capital and a little knowledge of farming. We will clear and cultivate your land on our fair and equitable TEN PER CENT ABOVE COST PLAN. Send for our Big Free Book—TWENTY ACRES AND PLENTY. It tells all about our dollar-an-acre monthly payment, sick and out of work clauses and other attractive features. Address Sylvester E. Wilson, Dept. 7, Orlando, Florida.

(NOTE: Mr. Wilson is Treasurer and principal owner of the Produce Reporter Company, Chicago, publishers of the "Blue Book," which is to the Fruit and Produce Trade what Dun's and Bradstreet are in other commercial fields.)

Women Beekeepers Make Good Money

There are thousands of women keeping bees successfully in this country today. A little help from the men folks in starting makes it easier, but even this is not necessary. It's fascinating. Big returns. Bees feed themselves. Take little room. Small investment to start. Easy to learn. We can tell you how, for we have had 50 years' experience. Write us today, telling us if you know anything about bees or not, and we will send free our handsome booklet, "Bees for Pleasure and Profit." It's packed full of information about bees and beekeeping.

Plan Your Garden Now

DON'T wait until planting time comes but plan your garden now. These long winter evenings are fine for planning. Study your seed catalogs and consult your farm papers for suggestions as to what to plant. Then sit down and draw a plan of your garden. Put your early vegetables where they will be handy to the kitchen so that the housewife can run out and get them easily and quickly. Line your potatoes and sweet corn up with your field crops so that you can cultivate with a horse. Don't ask the wife to use the hose for a job that can be better and much more quickly done with a horse.

Order Your Seeds Early

Don't wait until the rush of spring ordering to send for seeds and then complain because they are late in arrival. Order now before the seed houses are "swamped" with the spring rush and have your seeds on hand ready to plant as soon as the proper time comes and the ground and the weather are fit.

Try a Few Novelties

Don't be carried away with extravagant claims of advertisers—but, on the other hand, don't be afraid to try a few novelties each year. But remember when you buy novelties that you are taking a chance, and then if they fail, don't "kick." Often you will be greatly surprised and pleased with such an experiment. For your regular crop, however, stick to standard and well-known varieties.

Send for Bulletins and Catalogs Now

Are you going to try a new crop this year? Then send to your State Experiment Station for a bulletin on this crop and read up on it. This information is just what you need for success.

Search the advertising pages of farm papers for reliable seed house advertisements and send for their catalogs now so that you can order your seeds early. The main thing to remember is to "Plan your garden now." The rest will follow naturally.

Don't Buy Cheap Seeds

It doesn't pay to plant poor seed. A poor stand means a loss of the crop or a replanting. Cheap seeds mean a poor stand. Why?

It is often possible to buy seeds at a "penny a packet." What are these seeds? Invariably they are either old seeds, poor seeds or so small packets as to be scarcely worth while. Bargain-counter seeds are the poorest investment the farmer or gardener can make. Upon the seed depends completely the future crop. The farmer or gardener can't afford to risk his crop, which represents his season's work and is his usual source of income in poor seed. Buy proven seeds of reliable dealers.

Be wary, also, of the seed peddler. Whom does he represent? What guaranty have you of the reliability of the seeds he offers? Peddling is an expensive way of distributing seeds, and the peddler has to make a large profit to cover cost of doing business in this way.

Don't Plant Inferior Seed

"With all kinds of seed as high as they are, the use of inferior seed is a most expensive form of carelessness. Careful testing of practically all kinds of seed has long been urged by the United States Department of Agriculture, and special stress is being placed on it, now that prices are so unusually high. In the matter of clover seed, for instance, attention is called to the fact that comparatively cheap seed may be actually higher than those that cost more money, because of low germination. The department, at various times, has issued advice in bulletins and other forms of the best methods of testing seeds. This information may be had free on application."—U. S. Department of Agriculture.

Why Eat Vegetables

Vegetables should form a part of the daily diet if we wish to keep our bodies well nourished. All vegetables contain many valuable elements essential to growth of muscles, bones, blood, and also serve as fuel to keep the body warm.

The farmer when he is planning his garden must remember that it is not only a means of varying the monotony of the daily diet but is a great factor in keeping the family well and making the doctor's visits fewer.

Knowing this, it is very foolish to skimp on the variety of vegetables raised, or the necessary amount to serve plenty in the summer and also have a goodly surplus canned for the winter. Laying aside the fact of the economy of serving vegetables, the great reason which should never be forgotten is, if we wish to keep well, we must eat vegetables.

The Body Needs Vegetables

The blood requires a great deal of iron. Without it, we become pale, listless, and such a state, if allowed to continue, is dangerous. Of course, the doctor may administer iron to try and correct such a condition but the wise person by eating plenty of vegetables such as spinach, lettuce, beans, peas, carrots, corn, potatoes and turnips, not only is giving iron to the blood but is supplying other such needed essentials to body building.

Beans, peas and lentils are great muscle builders. Potatoes, beets, melons, sweet corn, carrots, or any vegetables with sugar in them, serve as fuel for the body and help warm it.

Bulk Necessary in Diet

Again, we need bulk in our diet. If we eat too concentrated a food, such as meat or cheese, we only aggravate that most prevalent condition, constipation, which is so fatal to the good health of the body. Among the vegetables that supply bulk and act as laxatives are asparagus, greens, cabbage, cauliflower, celery, onions, lettuce and cucumbers.

Use Milk with Vegetables

A wise way to cook vegetables, when no meat is served, is to use plenty of butter and milk; don't skimp on milk or butter when cooking vegetables as it surely is poor economy. Many times, children do not like vegetables because the housewife does not take proper care in preparing them. Some children dislike tomatoes cooked as a vegetable but made into a cream soup with milk and butter are very fond of it.

Carrots and peas cooked together with a white sauce are relished by many who would not eat the carrots alone. The wise housewife will tempt the appetite by taking particular care in preparing vegetable dishes, and train the children to eat them by trying different ways of serving.

Train Children to Eat Vegetables

There is no reason why a person, young or old, should dislike any particular vegetable. Many times we find it a foolish prejudice, and with children the mother should try to overcome this by especial care in cooking.

A great many grown-ups eat too much meat, cheese or other highly concentrated foods, thus laying the foundation for all kinds of bodily ills. It is easy for children to imitate their elders, and unless we are careful, sugar, meat and starchy foods will play havoc with the best bodily development of our boys and girls.

Another thing—don't cook vegetables in too much water, and don't throw away any vegetable water that can be used for soup, because the water contains the soluble food portions of the vegetable and should be saved.

Ask the doctor what he thinks of the part the garden should have in your diet. You may learn a lot of valuable things you have not thought of.

Stop Wasting Straw

It seems almost criminal to touch a match to a straw pile and so get it out of the way as quickly as possible. "Wilful waste brings woeful want," is an old saying but a good one, and while a farmer will not ruin himself and family by the poor policy of burning straw, he might thrive better by putting it to good use.

Spreading Straw

When the straw is merely blown into a field at threshing time as too cheap stuff to bale and not needed for stock bedding or feeding, it rots fairly well in districts where there is plenty of rain. Under these conditions it may be handled by a manure spreader and put on the sod that is to be plowed for corn. Loose, dry straw, however, has to be spread by means of a special machine and it has been found profitable to own and use such a straw spreader on large grain farms. Care must be taken, however, not to use diseased straw as a mulch on an autumn or spring sown grain crop. For instance, it would be dangerous to spread straw that is affected with anthracnose disease upon a growing wheat crop; nor do we favor spreading rusty straw where any grain crop is to be grown. It is better to plow under straw to loosen or open heavy clay soils, bind those that are sandy and at the same time add needed humus.

Baling Surplus Straw

On farms where straw is plentiful and not all needed for bedding and feed, it should be baled and sold on the market, provided plenty of animals are kept to make manure and so keep up fertility. Baled straw has been selling for as high prices as did hay a few years ago, and, costing but four or five dollars a ton to bale, should prove profitable when the market price is double those amounts. Better than selling it baled, however, is to store the bales—which occupy comparatively small space in the barn. Thus saved and stored, the straw is available in small quantities as needed for bedding and may come in most handy when a subsequent grain crop falls short in straw production. Baled straw keeps well, but would soon rot if left in the rough, loose pile so common on some farms.

Straw as Feed

Bright, clean, sound oat straw is excellent feed for cattle and horses. In Great Britain it forms the bulk of the roughage for the wintering of idle animals and growing stock. It is fed in conjunction with purple top Swedish turnips or rutabagas and mangolds with the addition of some cottonseed or linseed cake to give the necessary protein to balance the ration. Animals so fed maintain fine, sappy condition and grow well. We might follow this example where roots are available, or straw may be fed along with corn silage, as succulence, and bran, or ground grain and oilmeal or cake to balance the feed. Barley and bearded wheat straw are not well suited for feeding. The beards injure fleeces if sheep are allowed access to the straw stacks and cattle and horses are also injured to a certain extent by the beards lacerating or lodging in the mucous membranes of the mouth and in the tongue. Barley beards are commonly blamed for carrying into the tissues the spores of the actinomyces or ray fungus which causes wooden tongue and lump jaw. Wheat and rye straw are best for bedding purposes. Oat straw is rather chaffy and dusty for that purpose. Barley in the immature state is cut and made into hay for feeding purposes in the Pacific coast states and is valuable for that purpose. Straw is also useful as a mulch for strawberry beds and small fruits and is utilized to some extent to prevent sandy soils from blowing.

Oat straw never should be fed for any length of time as the exclusive roughage feed for horses. Experience shows that it disagrees with the horses in time and leads to many ailments and losses that are blamed to some other disease. Beware, too, of hay made from ripe millet, as it causes hock lameness in horses, unless made but a small part of the rations along with sound hay, straw and corn stover.

Six Aids to Beauty

By Madame Maree

Simple Methods, that Never Fail. Wonderful Results Noted in a Few Days, When These Helps Are Used for Complexion or Hair.

A Lily Skin in a Few Days

THERE is but one thing you need to beautify your skin and bring it to a condition of incomparable loveliness in a short time. This has been used by thousands of women with extraordinary success. By the use of this you will soon find that all red spots, freckles, all muddiness and sallowness will have disappeared completely, leaving the skin pure and clear as a lily. You cannot get this result except by mixing yourself at home, in a very few moments, one ounce of zintone with a little glycerine and hot water. The zintone costs fifty cents at the drug store. This makes a remarkable cream, which, when used liberally, will not fail to give you the results.

Hair Stops Falling, and Grows

You can easily prevent hair from falling, and you can make it grow thick and luxuriant by a very simple method, which is far superior in results to that of any so-called hair tonic you can buy. You will notice the difference in your hair in a very few days, and it will take on a vigorous lustre besides, and thin spots will at once begin to fill with new hair. This is done by simply adding one ounce of beta-quinol to a half pint of water and a half pint of bay rum. If you prefer you may use a full pint of witchhazel instead of the water and bay rum. The beta-quinol may be procured for fifty cents at any drug store. Try this and you will no longer find handfuls of hair coming out on your comb and brush, and your hair will be the envy of all your friends.

A Sure Way to Remove Wrinkles

It is really inspiring to know that removing wrinkles now depends almost entirely upon yourself. Just a few minutes' trouble at the start, and more than half the battle is over. It will take but a few moments for you to make a mixture of two ounces of eptol, a little water and glycerine. The eptol can be obtained from your druggist for fifty cents. This cream produces startling changes in the skin in a short time. It renders the skin plump and youthful, very girlish, and the result is that wrinkles fill out and disappear. It will make you look many years younger if you will only use it faithfully.

Secret about Washing Hair

Every scalp has constantly forming on it a thin, invisible film of fatty accumulations which soap cannot remove, not even with hard rubbing. The one way to remove this film, and let your hair breathe is to dissolve it. This is done by the use of a teaspoonful of eggol dissolved in a half cup of hot water, and used as a shampoo and headwash. This unseals the pores, and it will surprise you what a tremendous difference it produces in the appearance and growth of the hair. There is no more luxurious head-wash possible, and it is, besides, very economical. In a twenty-five cent package of eggol, which can be secured at any drug store, there is enough to supply you with over a dozen of these shampoos.

To Remove Superfluous Hair

There is a very remarkable way to remove superfluous hair. This is becoming exceedingly popular, because it is as easy and pleasing to use as a face lotion, and dissolves away the hair instead of burning it off as many other depilatories do. Simply moisten the hairs with a little sulfo solution. The hairs begin to shrivel. You can see them dissolve, and then with just a swish of the finger, all the hairs can be rubbed off clear and clean. It leaves the skin thoroughly free from all superfluous hairs, not leaving even a suggestion that you had any superfluous hairs at all. It is glorious. Every woman should have some sulfo solution on her dresser. It will cost one dollar at any drug store, and will last for a considerable time.

Blackheads Go in a Few Minutes

It is only a question of a few moments to get rid of blackheads. The only thing that will do this is neroxin. You sprinkle a little neroxin on a wet cloth or sponge and rub the blackheads with this for a few moments. Looking in your mirror, you will find the blackheads gone. This is a very remarkable article, and you need no longer use tonics, face-steaming, and pinching, and other useless methods for many months at a time. For fifty cents you can get the neroxin from your druggist.

NOTE—The articles mentioned herein have come into such demand because of their effectiveness that you can obtain them at any drug store. But if your druggist cannot supply you, arrangements have been made to send any of these articles by mail, charges paid, on receipt of price, by addressing "Secretary to Madam Maree, 584 Thompson Building, Chicago.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

BRUNETTE, Ark.—I may be old-fashioned and narrow-minded, but it doesn't seem right to me to go to dances Sunday evenings. If you don't go to church or prayer meeting on Sunday, you can, at least, refrain from dancing, though I don't object to it in moderation and under right conditions at other times.

UNDECIDED SWEETHEART, Garden, W. Va.—We do not think that any girl of seventeen does the best or happiest thing by "running off" to be married. In your case you seem not to have considered that in West Virginia the law demands that a girl be 21 years of age if she wishes to marry without her parents' consent. So that legal obstacle puts a decision to the question of "running off." On the other hand, if your parents have no objection to the young man, we do not think it is just that they should insist that you must wait until you are twenty before the ceremony takes place—particularly when your fiance is now 25 years of age and has the likelihood of making as good a husband as you describe. Cannot both of you talking together persuade your parents to consent to a compromise? Tell them that your schooling is finished and that you have already been engaged for several months, and that to wait over two years seems unnecessary and cruel to you both. Perhaps you can get them to agree to let the wedding take place on your nineteenth birthday—which would be the day we advise choosing. This would be a fair and pleasant solution of the difficulty—and would make no such work for the sheriff as would your plan of elopement.

R. R. S., Green Forest, Ark.—In entering a theater, it would be supposed that the gentleman had the tickets, which would require him to be ahead. After he has given the tickets or checks to an usher, it is best that the lady follow the usher down the aisle with the gentleman coming last.

B. A. M., Atwood, Kans.—Even if it is Leap Year, a girl does not give her fiance an engagement ring, and it is the man who must present this expensive circlet.

ANXIOUS LUCY, Ray, N. D.—Most assuredly, no "school marm" should keep a nineteen-year-old youth up until four o'clock in the morning. But perhaps he kept himself up until this late-early hour and "teacher" was not to blame. But either way it is wrong—according to etiquette, health, morals and gossip-loving neighbors. (2) Yes, a girl may ask her "beau" to escort her home, even though she has other opportunities of return and protection.

J. D., Salem, Ind.—We do not think you can justly demand your fiancee remaining away from entertainments which circumstances prevent your attending. You can, however, ask and expect that she will not at these entertainments receive or return any marked attentions from other young men. This is a matter which should easily arrange itself between you both, according to your fiancee's good judgment and her pre-supposed fondness for you. (2) A girl must have reached the age of 18 in your State, if she wishes to marry without her parents' consent—which is a most foolish and unhappy thing to do.

BROWN EYES, England, Ark.—There is always a possibility of a letter being unreceived—particularly when you are writing to a young man in the service. Why not write again and put a return address on the letter? You should not let any foolish fondness for this soldier cause you to "not learn anything" at school. Schools were made for a better purpose and use. And now you see your parents were right, too.

DOROTHY PLEASE.—No, it is not "proper nor polite" to let a boy kiss you when you are fifteen—or when you are sixteen, seventeen or eighteen! And so, of course, there would be no question of thanking him and kissing him back—even if any girl was foolish enough to think this was the polite thing to do.

BETRIX, Dugspur, Va.—It is courteous and correct for you to thank anyone who congratulates you upon your marriage. But you need not express this thanks in formal words. Say, for instance: "It's kind of you to give me such good wishes!"

G. J., Danville, Wash.—When a man winks at a girl with "his right eye and also with his left eye," it means that he is waiting for some one to teach him better manners. This has been done upon occasion with a fist and sometimes with a club. (2) If a girl has need of waiting for some one at a hotel, she should seat herself in some parlor or room reserved for ladies. She should not remain in any room where a "bunch" of men congregate.

G. G., Middletown, O.—If this boy does not answer your card, it is probable that he has ceased to care for you and we do not see that you can expect to win him back. You are wise in saying that no one should "marry for a home", but the fact that you are an orphan of twenty years of age alters the rule somewhat. Marrying without love is dangerous, but if this other man cares deeply for you and you respect and appreciate him, there would be a good chance for your happiness. But marriage is a serious matter, and your chances of wedded joy are all the greater because you know this and are considering the matter carefully before you go to the altar.

WHITE HEAD, Lexington, Ala.—We think it strange that any girl you had never met should write to you and ask you to call. It would not be necessary for you to notice such a letter unless you wish, and if, as you say, you "love another"—why, we advise you to go on with your present love and leave the new letter-writing girl to send invitations to some other Lexington boy.

BROWN EYES, Viewfield, S. Dak.—Plates should be turned up, not down, when setting a table. The knife is placed at the right-hand side of the plate and the fork and spoon at the left.

NEW FRIEND, Ferrum, Va.—We cannot tell from your letter why it is you "have no sweethearts," but we are going to assure you that this is exactly the right sort of deprivation for a schoolgirl of fifteen. You will have no foolish "love affairs" to keep your mind from your books, and you will have time enough for "sweethearts" three or four years from now when you will have finished your education. (2) A boy is introduced or presented to a girl. A simple mentioning of names would suffice—giving the girl's name first place, or you may say, more formally: "Miss Blank, I want to present Mr. Dash."

MOHAWK, Wheelock, N. D.—We cannot imagine why a boy weighing 164 pounds would want to wear "skin-tight trousers." We have not heard of this being the mode at present and we believe the use of such nether garments would be uncomfortable and rather damaging to decorum when worn at a dance. (2) You are old enough to "pay attention to girls," but we think that one or two dances a week should be all that you had best attend. And do not let such dances keep you up until after midnight. You say wisely that you are "a boy,"—and boys need plenty of sleep.

BLUE BELL, Spencer, W. Va.—A girl should not write to a boy whom she has never met—no matter how "nice" letters he writes, and neither should a girl let a boy kiss her before she is engaged to him, or let him take her home from church with his arm around her. The right kind of a boy will respect you all the more if you refuse to grant him such liberties.

FRIEND, Wellston, Ga.—It would be permissible for you to kiss a young man good by when you considered him as your fiance. If you had once gone so far as to plan such a foolish and wrong thing as "running away" with this young man, we are not surprised that he was angry when you refused to kiss him farewell when he was returning to his ship. (2) We advise you not to think of marrying any man you do not love—even though he has money enough to make him attractive as a match. Married life is a long and sometimes difficult companionship which needs love to make the wheels run smoothly in the daily grind.

BROWN EYES, Tallulah Falls, Ga.—If you are in love with a young man who talks so much that other girls do not like him, we do not see why you need particularly object to his loquacity when it operates to leave him more free for your affection. If he has no worse fault than this you are lucky. (2) A boy should escort home the same girl he takes to any entertainment. As for boys who flirt, we can only tell you what one COMFORT reader wrote to this department: "Boys are good to look at, but not to be trusted!" And this girl claimed to have had experience to prove the assertion.

SAGE TEA TURNS GRAY HAIR DARK

If Mixed with Sulphur It Darkens so Naturally Nobody can Tell.

Almost everyone knows that Sage Tea and Sulphur, properly compounded, brings back the natural color and lustre to the hair when faded, streaked or gray. Years ago the only way to get this mixture was to make it at home, which is mussy and troublesome. Nowadays, by asking at any drug store for "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound," you will get a large bottle of this famous old recipe, improved by the addition of other ingredients, at a small cost.

Don't stay gray! Try it! No one can possibly tell that you darkened your hair, as it does it so naturally and evenly. You dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning the gray hair disappears, and after another application or two, your hair becomes beautifully dark, glossy and attractive.

for breakfast, for all I know, or pancakes and syrup. You can't upset the plans of a family, of course, but you can eat more of the things that are good for you than of those which are not. Drink milk whenever you can get it, and if you have to eat hot bread, then hot corn bread is probably best. Baked potatoes are especially good for you; fried potatoes are not good for you. Fried ham isn't fattening, but chicken or fish or steak or a chop are strengthening, and should be broiled or roasted, not fried. However, if your family cook meals a different way, don't worry about it. Just chew each mouthful of whatever you have until it is liquid before you swallow it; don't drink tea or coffee, but drink plenty of water between your meals; eat fresh fruit whenever you can get it. Now about the bashfulness, that comes from not being with other girls right along and therefore not having the same things to talk about. Don't you go to school? And can't you be chummy at school? I'd try to be. And when they come out to see you, try to think up some games to play before they come, and then propose one. If you get started, it will all be easier. You will get over being bashful as you grow older. The only cure for bashfulness is to think about other people instead of about one's self, and until one is older that is a little hard to do sometimes. About the other problem which makes you somewhat unhappy, try to do just exactly what you are asked to do as rapidly and pleasantly as possible, without objecting or fussing. This will make things easier, and when you are a little older, you will probably be the one who decides things. Keep your mind happy and good natured, and sweet as can be, because all that has an effect on your health. Think only good, sweet, clean thoughts and do good, sweet, clean things, and you will help your whole body. I shall consider you one of my own special girls, doing every day that which will make you a fine woman, and none of the things which keep you from being one. And I am sure I shall be proud of you. About the hair under the arms, see my answer to "Blue Eyes" in the last issue. It won't take the hair away permanently, but it will stay away for a while. It isn't worth while thinking too much about such things for a good long time to come. Do you get a chance to read good books? I should read all I could if I were you—books like "Little Women," by Louisa Alcott, or any other of Miss Alcott's books, or "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," or "Anne of Green Gables." You did not give the name of the town you live near; is there any library there, where you could get books once in a while? One makes such good friends in books!

MONTANA.—Another one of my younger girls. Well, you have quite a bunch of questions. I'll start right in by saying you are all right as to weight, for your age. Your skin will whiten out and your eyes clear up as you get through the "growing-up" stage. Your lips and gums are pale because your circulation is not very good, I imagine. See that you eat lots of good food, and chew it thoroughly, and that you get plenty of fresh air and sleep. As your blood is made richer by food, your lips and gums will get redder. You just simply have to make blood for them. Don't worry about it but live just as sensibly as you can and make just as much good rich blood as you can by eating sensible foods and plenty of them. See what I said above to "Worried Girl." Your enlarged neck is probably from your circulation, too. Don't worry about it, but just wait. It will disappear, I am sure, a little later. I have known several girls who had the same experience. If your hair is oily, be sure to shampoo it regularly, once in two weeks. Never mind the sunburn on it, but brush it regularly, and take care of it. It will be all right later. About the nails, trim them to follow the shape of the ends of the fingers. Do not clean them with a steel instrument of any kind. Buy an orange-wood stick and use that, always soaking the nails for a few minutes beforehand in soapy warm water. Buy also a steel nail file and use that to file the ends of the nails to the right shape—it is better than using scissors. As to the knuckles, they will not look so large when you add a little more flesh to the hands, and, in the meantime, keep the hands in good condition. I should think you might wear light or dark blue, yellow, rose, and probably brown very well indeed, as well as white. White is always pretty on young people. About your nose, I can't do anything, my dear, but I doubt its being ugly. There are all kinds of noses in the world, and not many of them are really ugly if they are on smiling faces. Keep your facial skin clean and smooth and your hair well shampooed and brushed (never use water on your brush or water on your hair between shampoos), and your nose won't matter in the least. Blackheads are pores filled with dust. See what I said to "Georgia," and follow that advice. About hats, you should judge of that yourself when trying them on. If your face is broad, as you say, probably a rather broad brim would be more becoming to you than a narrow brim. As to your hair, you are not at all too old to braid it. Tell your friends that fashionable mothers braid their daughters' hair until they are seventeen or eighteen, often. If you want to "do it up," then part it in the middle, and also from ear to ear. You can roll the ends of the back hair either under or over and make a roll across the back of the neck close to the head; first, however, rolling each half of the front hair in a becoming way, and pinning the ends low on the back hair, covering the ends when you roll the back hair. Watch pictures you see in the magazines, and practice doing your hair as girls of your age wear it, using the picture as a guide. Now I'm sure I have answered everything except about the baths. The thing to be careful about is not to get chilled.

Prisoners of the Storm

By Robert Wingate

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

JESSICA sat cowering over the sheet-iron stove in the tiny living-room of the sod-house while the fiercest of December blizzards howled and raged across the prairie. She opened the front draft to encourage the smouldering fire; then rose and cast a timid glance through the little window at the desolation without. The air was filled with whirling and hissing flakes; the sky overhead was black; drifts were already piling high, and objects more than twenty feet away were lost to view.

Around the gables of the cabin the icy wind howled like a hungry beast. It was hardly two hours since the norther had swept across the valley; and already the forlorn little homestead was as a bark adrift on a vast and storm-tossed ocean. For minutes she gazed fascinated at the whirling drifts and vainly endeavored to make out any familiar landmark. Then with a shiver she seated herself again in the camp chair before the fire.

There came a thundering knock at the door. Jessica started up with a little cry of joy, and flung it open, admitting an arctic blast that swept before it myriads of stinging icy particles and threatened to lift the roof from its fastenings. But the storm wind was not the most terrifying intruder. Jessica's heart went cold in an instant, and she uttered a scream of fright. A tall man stood before her. Clad in a great fur coat and with shoulders deeply laden with snow, he looked as huge and as ruthless as the Great Bear of the Mountains of which, years ago, she had heard such terrifying tales. She started back toward the stove, and the man closed and hooked the door. He came forward as unsteadily as a drunken man, stood panting and gazing for a moment, then said breathlessly:

"You needn't be frightened. I don't aim to do you any harm. I was mighty lucky to locate your shack. If I hadn't, 'twould have been all up with me mighty soon."

"Were you lost in the storm?" Jessica managed to say.

"I surely was. I started to ride up to the ranch from Cartersville about noon. The norther struck me, and in ten minutes I lost my bearings entirely. My horse stumbled along just as long as he could; then he laid down in a drift and gave it up. Since then I have been plowing along anyhow. I never'd 'a made the ranch. I didn't see your shack till I almost bumped into it."

"Take off your coat and draw up to the fire," said Jessica, now partially recovered from her fright. "I——I was kind of expecting somebody else. That's why it scared me so when you came in."

"I see," said the stranger, slowly, and peering at her through the ice-fringe on his eyelashes. "Well, I hope the one you was expecting had better sense than I did, and stayed under cover. If not, he's liable to be under a drift by this time. This is a bad old day,—the worst I've ever seen in these parts."

By this time he had divested himself of his hat and coat and was seated in a camp chair by the stove with his half-frozen hands extended toward its grateful warmth. Jessica gasped with a new surprise.

"Why! you're Mr. Steele of the ranch, aren't you?"

"Yes, I'm Jeffrey Steele. I thought you knew me."

His handsome black eyes met hers, and told more plainly than words his admiration of her bright young face and rounded, maidenly figure. A new emotion swept over her that was compounded of surprise and fear and a strange, lawless joy.

"I've only seen you once, near to. And then you were on horseback."

A sudden gleam came into the ranchman's eyes.

"Yes, I come here to drive you and your sister out of the valley. And I would have to if it had been a man I had to deal with. My grazing permit covers everything between Bald Mountain and the West Fork; and so far we hadn't put up with any nesters. But now, just because I didn't drive you out, and you folks put up your cabin right here, I'm here by a good fire instead of frozen to death at the bottom of a drift."

Jessica made no reply, though her heart was pounding. For five minutes they listened to the roaring wind. The dim light of the storm-filled afternoon was rapidly fading; it was almost dark in the cabin.

"Where's your sister?" asked Steele suddenly.

"I guess—maybe—she's asleep," replied Jessica, faintly, with a glance toward the bedroom door.

The young rancher glanced at her keenly, but was silent for several minutes.

"Shall I put on more wood?" he said at length. "Have you got plenty?"

"Yes, we got plenty wood. I guess 'twon't be so we can't get into the shed after it. We got in two loads only last week."

The visitor crowded a huge chunk through the stove door and resumed his seat.

"Your sister is a mighty smart traveler," he said after gazing for a while through the little window at the inky sky.

"How do you mean?" questioned Jessica, nervously.

"When I was coming out of Cartersville, about noon," resumed the other, twisting his chair about and squarely facing his trembling auditor, "she was at Nichols' stable, trying to get a double rig to bring her up here with groceries and so on that she'd bought. Nichols was telling her that there was a blizzard coming sure, that she'd get caught in it if she made the attempt, and that she surely couldn't have any of his horses. I thought she was going to stop over at Mrs. Barton's. That's what Nichols was advising."

Jessica gazed at him wide-eyed. Twice or thrice she essayed in vain to speak. The little clock on the shelf behind her ticked loudly. The bright eyes of her visitor gazed into hers with an ominous steadiness. At last the words poured from her in a torrent:

"Mr. Steele, my sister isn't here. She started off this morning after supplies. There's nobody else in the house."

"Sho! I know," responded the ranchman, coolly. "You don't need to worry about her. They wouldn't ever let her start from Cartersville. Nichols has more sense than I have, I guess. They'll just keep her down there till the storm's over, tomorrow or next day, maybe. Then they'll fix up some kind of rig to get out here."

He rose and peered out again at the wild scene which was visible through the darkening window.

"It looks uncommon as if I wouldn't get out of here tonight."

Jessica joined him at the window. After a moment she half whispered:

"No, you mustn't try it. You'd be lost and frozen sure."

"That's right. That's just what would happen. But I guess there's no need. We're snug enough here, I'll say."

Jessica could not trust herself to reply. She was shivering violently as though the blizzard had penetrated the sod house and smothered the blaze in the little stove. After a moment she turned to light the oil lamp, and spoiled three matches before she succeeded. Steele resumed his chair. The night was fast closing in, and the storm showed no signs of abating. Through the long silences the wind howled eerily.

By the light of the lamp Jessica could see her visitor more clearly than at any time since his arrival, for the little room had been in semi-darkness all the afternoon. Now she fully realized something that had been vaguely in her mind ever since the brief and angry interview when Steele had ordered them out of the valley. He was the handsomest man she had ever seen. His coal-black hair was brushed straight back from a shapely forehead, and his profile was like what she remembered having seen in a statue somewhere. There was an almost military set to his broad shoulders. He was much younger than she had thought,—certainly not more than twenty-six or twenty-eight,—and his quick and nervous movements were those of an athlete.

She tried desperately to avoid the appearance of watching him and yet to read the thoughts that lurked behind those glowing, black eyes. Terrified and fascinated by turns, she recalled the tales of the young ranchman's lawless exploits,—driving homesteaders from the valley, bidding defiance to revenue men and deputy sheriffs and administering a swift and terrible justice on crooked gamblers and horse thieves.

As if half conscious of these furtive glances, Steele rose from his chair and began pacing nervously back and forth in the narrow confines of the room, his tall figure seeming to fill the place as that of a lion fills his cage.

Finally Jessica spoke, her voice sounding thin and far away:

"Perhaps you'd like to smoke. If you would, go ahead. I don't mind it."

Jeffrey stopped and stood in front of her.

"Well, then," he said, slowly drawing a pipe from an inner pocket. "I say now! You know my name; but I haven't ever heard yours."

He was bending forward eagerly, a strange smile on his dark countenance.

"Jessica," she replied, nervously, "Jessica Ballantyne."

"Jessica," he repeated, softly. "That's a pretty name,—just a good name for a girl as pretty as you, I'd say. I saw a play once where a girl named Jessica had a mighty pretty part. She had big, blue eyes, a good deal like yours."

His companion was breathing quickly, but made no reply. After a moment he went on ingratiatingly:

"And so you're out here trying to make a farm in the short-grass country. You don't find it 'specially easy, do you?"

"Not very," answered Jessica, looking ruefully at her scarred and calloused hands.

"That's so. Must be," mused the other, now seated in the camp chair and drawing meditatively at his pipe. "Well, maybe 'twon't be so bad, come spring. I gen'ly have two-three mules 'round that are not doin' much, and maybe a driver or so."

"Oh, if you mean you'll send 'em over to help work our land,—I don't b'lieve we could have them. My sister would never hear of it."

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Lame Cattle and Sheep

AT this time of the year cattle are most liable to become lame from what commonly is called "fouls" or "foul in the feet." The affected animals first show stiffness and disinclination to walk. Then it is seen that the ankle joints are swollen, hot and painful; or these symptoms may be confined to the hoof-heads. After a time, if treatment is not given, sores may appear between the toes, or about the heels. Then the animal may persist in lying down and is extremely lame when made to walk. Naturally, the milk flow now diminishes or shrinks to a negligible amount and the animal may also lose appetite and so fail to thrive if it has been upon a growing or fattening ration.

Try to prevent these foot lamenesses by keeping cattle out of yards or fields that are deep with slush, mud and manure. Cornstalks lodge between the toes or mud and manure collects and packs there, setting up irritation, lacerating the fine skin and then infects it with the filth germ bacillus necrophorus. Pus may now form and burrow and in the worst cases the hoof or a part of it may slough off. The chronic, eating or canker sores about the hoof-heads usually are due to the bacillus named, but in some instances ergot in rye, grain or straw or in ripe June grass or timothy is the cause and this poison may cause deep sloughs in a ring below the fetlock, or lead to loss of the hoofs, tail or horns. Sheep also suffer from foot-rot, the worst form of it being due to the bacillus necrophorus. Filth, wet, mud, slush and collections of dirt, manure, grit or pieces of cornstalks between the toes also cause more or less acute lameness which may be followed by true foot-rot. Prevention is most important.

Treat by removing the cause, cleansing the feet, cutting away all loose, rotten or under-run horn of sole or wall, then immersing the treated feet for two or three minutes in hot water containing two ounces of bluestone to the pint. Use a saturated solution in the worst cases. Then cover the sore parts with oakum saturated with a five per cent solution of coal tar disinfectant, bind it on with bandages criss-crossed between the toes and renew the dressing daily until doing well; then apply pine tar.

SPAVIN.—I bought a horse, 12 years old, last spring, which had a spavin on his right hind leg. It bothers him a great deal, when he has to make a hard pull, or when I make a long drive. Can an old spavin be cured? E. M.

A.—The only successful treatment for removal of lameness in such a place will be to have the spavin and entire hock joint fired and blistered by a qualified veterinarian and then tie the horse up short in a narrow stall for six weeks. The veterinarian may also deem it well to perform cunean tenotomy before firing. If you cannot employ a veterinarian, tie the horse up short and blister the joint and spavin three or four times at intervals of three weeks.

BLOAT.—Please tell me what was the matter with my cow. She was well at night. I milked her and fed her with sack of shucks, one half bushel of cotton-seed hulls and cotton-seed meal. Next morning she was dead and badly swollen. W. L. T.

A.—The feed no doubt killed the cow by causing bloat and suffocation. The amount of hulls and cotton-seed meal was excessive, especially if the cow was very hungry or unaccustomed to such feed. If seen in time, life possibly might have been saved by tapping the paunch with a trocar and canula.

SWEATING IN STABLE.—I have a seven-year-old mare weighing between 1600 and 1700 pounds. When standing in the barn at night she will sweat on her left side only, until the water drips off from her. What is the cause and remedy? She eats first and second cutting alfalfa and, ounce in a while, oats, and has fresh water to drink. I have been a subscriber for ten years. MRS. G. W.

A.—Indigestion is the usual cause of such sweating, but nerve derangement may be the cause when only a certain part is affected. Stop feeding alfalfa hay. Clip the hair from legs above knees and hocks and from her belly to a line with the straps of breast collar and breeching. Let her occupy a box stall when in the stable, but have her work or take outdoor exercise every day.

SORES.—I have a Jersey cow that has two sores just below the top of her head. They will nearly heal and then break out again. They have been there about seven months. I had her dehorned a year ago.

A.—Cleanse the sores thoroughly and then paint them twice daily with tincture of iodine. If they are not due to dehorning we suspect that ringworm is the cause and we are prescribing for that disease.

WIND GALLS.—What is the drug used to give a horse's hair a fine glossy appearance? (2) What will remove wind galls from a four-year-old horse's hind ankle? Is there a cure when galls have been hardened by blistering?

A.—Plenty of good feed, thorough grooming and blanketing are better than any drug for putting a polish on a horse's skin. Fowler's solution of arsenic also is useful. The average dose is a tablespoonful night and morning. (2) Wind galls are incurable when established. Bandaging a flat cork upon each puff may remove or lessen them temporarily.

AILING HORSE.—Please give me information about my mare. She has been sick three months, is well fed but it does not seem to do her any good. She is thin in flesh, weak and can hardly walk and when she goes up hill her heart beats fast as if she had been running. She licks the cows all over and won't eat salt. I have had a veterinarian but he didn't help her. She is five years old, and the hair in her tail and mane is coming out. B. C.

A.—If the veterinarian cannot determine what is wrong with the mare we cannot do so without making an examination, but on general principles we should advise you to feed her generously on crushed oats, wheat, bran, corn, carrots and best of hay. Better have her teeth put in order by the veterinarian. If she does not improve, give her half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning in a little water, adding 30 drops of fluid extract of Nux Vomica Jamaica. Increase the nux a drop and repeat if any alarming symptoms appear. It is best to give such medicines under the directions of the veterinarian.

COLIC.—I bought a mare about a year ago and ever since I have had her she has had something similar to colic or it may be indigestion. I have tried many colic cures but don't get much satisfaction from them. Raw linseed oil seems to do her good. She lies down, stretches out as far as she can and then gets up and looks back to her stomach. She leans first on one foot then on the next. When worked steadily is not so bad, when not worked is worse. When she is over the colic she is so hungry she can't wait till she is fed. Please give me some advice. Mc. S. P.

A.—Never let the mare stand for a single day without walking or running outdoors for exercise. Stop all grain feed when she is idle, but allow bran roots and good hay. Allow free access to rock salt. Feed from a large box and add dry bran to the oats to make her chew thoroughly. If the oats pass whole in the feces, have her teeth put in order by a veterinarian. Give her a pint of raw linseed oil at a time of each attack and then put her on half rations. Keep the bowels active at all times.

WARTS.—I have a young cow. About four months ago, a lump came above her eye, which looked like a wart. It is still growing and now three or four smaller ones are coming around the edge of her eyelid. I would like to know what to do for her. F. D.

A.—Rub best castor oil or pure olive oil into the growths twice daily and if they are ordinary warts they may soon disappear. If they are cancerous, the knife should be used, followed by cauterization of the wounds. If a growth has a slim neck it will drop off after a time if tightly ligated with a fine cord or smaller rubber bands.

DROPSICAL SWELLING.—I have a milch cow that has a swelling under her chin and throat. It hangs in a roll and is soft. She looks thin. What is the trouble and what can I do? MRS. M. P.

A.—The swelling does not in itself constitute a disease, but is an indication or symptom of bloodlessness (anemia) due to some debilitating disease, or to starvation. Have the cow tested with tuberculin and if she does not prove to be tuberculous feed her generously on mixed meals and good hay.

THIN SHEEP.—I have a sheep and when I try to drive her home she will run back to a certain place in the creek and act as though she had dropped a lamb. I cannot see anything and there is no bog there. She won't eat hay or oats. P. B. R.

A.—In such cases the mouth should be examined for the cause of inability or disinclination to eat. Stoppage of the bowels or worms also, may cause such symptoms and we should consider the sheep too far gone to be worthwhile treating, so that it would be humane to put it out of its misery.

DEHORNING A SHEEP.—I have a ram that I want to dehorn. I am told it will kill him. I have read COMFORT over twenty years. L. D. F.

A.—It would be best not to dehorn the ram, but if it must be done it can be accomplished by means of a fine, clean meat saw. Afterward, bind oakum upon the wounds after applying pine tar. Renew the dressing at intervals of two or three days.

Poultry Farming for Women

different stages of incubation. The subject of incubation was pretty well covered in the January number, but as you say you have had no experience, perhaps the following hints will be helpful: Remember that the incubator must stand perfectly even. Nothing but the use of a carpenter's level can determine this point. Next, the machine must not stand under or near a window or door, or any opening which is likely to cause a draft. If the machine has been used before, thoroughly dust and disinfect it, no matter how well it was cleansed after last season's work. An accumulation of dust or a tiny cobweb in the heater may cause a lot of trouble and loss by causing the lamp to smoke. Be sure that the lamp is in perfect order; no dents or cracked edges on the burner; hinges and snap in good condition, and every part perfectly clean. Put in a new wick which exactly fits the slot, for if the wick is the slightest bit narrow, air will creep up the edges, and probably cause the flame to flicker or smoke: and if it is too wide, it won't turn up and down evenly. Light the lamp, and allow the machine to warm up for several hours. Leave the door of the machine open about half an inch, and the lamp burning, until all the moisture is dried out; then close up and allow the heat to reach 102 degrees, at which point regulate the automatic heat control according to the instructions sent out with the machine, and run it for a day or two before putting in the eggs, to assure yourself that the thermostat is working properly, and that the tin disk over the heat escape closes down evenly when the lamp is removed for filling, and that it rises to the correct heat after the lamp is replaced. It is well to test the efficiency of the different parts which constitute the automatic control several times. After the machine has been running some hours with a moderate flame, the disk one sixteenth of an inch above the escape pipe, and the thermometer registering 102, open the door of the machine until the thermometer drops to 99; then close it. The disk should have shut down when the temperature went down, and if the thermostat and all the parts are working properly, the disk should again rise one sixteenth of an inch above the escape, and the thermometer again register 102 degrees within a few minutes after closing the door. Should the disk swing to one side, or fail to rise with the change of temperature, study the maker's directions very carefully, and try to decide what is wrong. If the book of instructions gives no directions for remedying such difficulties, examine the wire which attaches the disk to the regulating arm and to the disk itself. The slightest bend in the wire or kink in the disk is liable to cause the trouble, and must be carefully corrected. If neither wire nor disk are at fault, unscrew the connecting rod which runs through the machine and connects the thermostat with the regulating arm, draw it up three or four inches, and let it drop back. If it sticks, even in a slight degree, or fails to fall truly and evenly into place, it has got bent, and must be straightened, for if it rubs or binds, it will prevent its answering the automatic action of the thermostat. You know, I suppose, that the thermostat is composed of such sensitive metal that it immediately expands or contracts with variation of heat in the egg chamber. This contraction or expansion affects the connecting rod, and the rod in turn influences the regulating arm, at the end of which the disk which controls the escape of heat is suspended. I have given this short, rough explanation of the connecting influence of the different parts which constitute the automatic heat control in all modern incubators, for the directions sent out with some incubators just tell how to connect the parts, and give no explanation of cause and effect to guide the poor amateur if anything goes wrong.

M. E.—I think anyone who lives in the country, who is industrious and uses good common sense, will find poultry raising profitable. Commence with a few birds, and build up your flock as you gain experience and customers. Personally, I prefer White Wyandottes to any other breed, and keep them exclusively. They are good winter layers, and, both as broilers and roasters, splendid for table use, because they have small bones and compact frames, so are easily fattened at any age.

S. R.—The rooster has roup. Even if he recovers, I advise you not to use him in the breeding house. Roup tendencies are almost sure to appear in his offspring.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. A. K., Illinois.—We are of the opinion that the laws of Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Washington and Wyoming prohibit marriages between first cousins.

MRS. E. C., Arkansas.—I do not think you now have any chance of enforcing the property rights abandoned by your fatner in 1877.

L. H., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, his widow would receive his entire estate, after payment of debts and the expenses of administration; we think that money deposited in bank in the joint names of two depositors, upon the death of one, becomes the sole property of the survivor.

J. S., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a tenant cannot, upon the expiration of his lease, remove such improvements as he has placed upon the property in a manner so that such improvements have become affixed to the freehold; he can, however, remove such improvements as he may have placed upon the property in a manner so that they are simply attached to the freehold. (2) We think your liability to your employer for rent, would depend upon your contract of employment. (3) We think the man who purchased the goods you mention can be compelled to pay for same through the proper court action brought for the purpose of enforcing payment of same, provided he had any property, not exempt by law, from levy under execution.

X. Y. Z., Georgia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children may be disinherited by will.

ANXIOUS, Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, and subject to the payment of debts and expenses, the widow would receive all of the personal estate up to $3,000, and one half of the balance, and one half of the real estate, the balance of the estate going to his parents, brothers or sisters or their descendants, depending upon who is left; if none of such, the whole estate would go to the surviving widow.

MRS. E. L. W., North Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon your death, without a will, and without a child or descendant, after the payment of debts and expenses, your husband will receive your whole estate if the same does not exceed $5,000 in value, and if in excess of that amount, one half of the balance, the remaining one half of the balance of the estate going to your parents, brothers and sisters or their descendants, depending upon who is left; if none of such, the whole estate will go to your surviving husband.

M. F., Nebraska.—We are of the opinion that the claim of your father-in-law's estate against your father-in-law's brother, arising from the payment by your father-in-law of the note he endorsed for his brother, will be barred by the statute of limitations if sufficient time elapses, and provided such defense is plead in any action brought to enforce the claim.

G. F. B., North Carolina.—If the company, from which you ordered the goods, does not send you your goods, we think you should bring suit against them for the recovery of your money.

M. B., Indiana.—We do not think you can compel your husband to return to you the money you voluntarily advanced for the purchase of the property you now hold in both of your names.

MRS. N. A. B., Colorado.—There is no U. S. law providing pensions for the widows of Confederate soldiers.

MRS. A. B. G., Pennsylvania.—If your life insurance policy is a straight life policy in form, it will, upon your death, be paid to the beneficiary named in the policy.

MRS. M. R. F., Oklahoma.—We do not think marriages between first cousins are prohibited in Alabama, California, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia and West Virginia.

MRS. H. P, South Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your husband, without a will, and leaving you and two children surviving, his estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go one third to you and one third to each of the children; his interest in the partnership you mention would be an asset of his estate.

MRS. H. T. A., New Mexico.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, his whole estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to his surviving widow, this to include his separate as well as the community property.

MRS. E. S., Alabama.—We think the laws of all the states of the United States require marriage licenses.

C. W. A., Pennsylvania.—We think you should communicate with the Federal Farm Loan Board at Washington, D. C., for information as to farm loans by the Government.

MRS. E. McM., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the husband cannot, by will, bar his widow from her right to receive one half of the community property, upon his death.

C. F., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, his widow would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, and one half of his personal estate, absolutely, after the payment of debts and expenses, the balance of his estate going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

MRS. R. M., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, her husband would receive a life estate in her real estate and a child's part, absolutely, in her personal estate, the remainder going in equal shares to her children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share; the decedent's estate would include any interest, vested in her at the time of her death, of another estate; the share of any minor child should be paid to such minor's general guardian, and such guardian should account and turn over such share to the minor upon the minor's becoming of age; the husband's life estate in the real estate would not, however, terminate until the death of the husband.

M. J., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, his widow would receive homestead rights, and dower, of a one-third interest for life, in his real estate, and the residue of his personal estate, absolutely, after payment of debts and expenses, the remainder of the real estate going to his brothers, sisters or their descendants, or his parents, depending upon who is left.

M. T. W., Texas.—Under the laws of Nebraska, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention stood in the name of the husband, it would have been necessary for the wife to have survived him in order to have acquired any vested interest in his property, and upon her death, during his lifetime, he could legally dispose of the property; if, however, the property belonged to the wife and stood in her name, upon her death, without a will, he could only dispose of his interest in the property of her estate. (2) We think you should communicate with the asylum authorities as to the release of your aunt.

D. L. S., Missouri.—If you are of full age, and if you cannot make satisfactory terms of employment with your father, we think it might be wise for you to try working for someone else; we do not think you are in duty bound to contribute your entire services to your father if he has sufficient property to support himself.

MRS. P. B., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children, his widow would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, and a child's part, absolutely, in his personal property; we think the conveyance of the real estate to the decedent and his heirs vested absolute title in the decedent, and that he could have sold or disposed of the property in any way, during his lifetime, without the consent of his children, if he died, without a will, they now each have their child's part in his estate which includes this real estate.

neglect of his studies he has become a bright, energetic boy as well up with his studies as he is with his team. And as well liked by his teachers as he is by his coach.

I have three daughters also, the oldest graduated from Lanier High last year, the next girl will graduate this year and the boy, age sixteen, and the youngest girl, age 12, have just started going to Lanier, the boy having done this by studying under a teacher who loved athletics as well as he did and after going to her seven weeks last summer he skipped the seventh grade and entered high school. And his "athletic" teacher (who teaches sixth grade) told him if he would make the basket ball team by the middle of the year she would give him a nice present.

Dear Worried Mother, if you haven't done so, try to be a pal with your boy as the teacher and I have been trying to be with my boy. It will work wonders.

I have taken COMFORT for fifteen years, but unlike some of the sisters I do not have time to read it from cover to cover, as my life is very full with the care of a large family.

If "Worried Mother" will write me I will gladly give her all the information on the subject that the experience which my own son made possible.

A CONTENTED MOTHER.

VIRGINIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I do enjoy reading the letters from the sisters and brothers, though Bachelor Bill was rather severe I thought, but we'll forgive him. Mrs. Vesey's letters are good.

I think Auntie Wood's motto grand.

Well, Mrs. Wilkinson, I am writing mostly to help Mr. S. C. Sheppard out on his poem which Uncle Sam would not permit him to complete. I think he must have a very lonesome time so far away from everyone but I wouldn't mind taking a trip out there if I had someone to keep those fearful wild animals away from me. I hope he will come again and tell us some of his adventures.

I will close by describing myself and leaving my address with Mrs. Wilkinson. I have brown hair, blue eyes and am five feet, three inches tall and am between seventeen and twenty-two years of age.

Success to all. VIRGINIA ROSE.

"Where the woodbine twines,
And the whang doodle sings,
And the frog flips its wings in glee,
And the coyote whines,
Where the cow bell chimes
From the cattle on the le

When I pause to rest,
I've done my best,
Uncle Sam can bank on me.
Yes, I need a shave and a hair cut too,
But I see no ladies,
No good 'twill do.
For we have no rest, nor Sundays here,
But are on the trail the whole of the year.

Now Uncle Sam I will do my best,
So pray don't stop me when I start to rest.
I am writing this poem in pure display
Of my life in the west so far away.
Now Uncle Sam you can trust to me,
To guard your stock on the lonely lea.

Virginia Rose.—Do you suppose "S. C." lets the cattle on the lea take turns wearing that lone cow bell? After we get Uncle Charlie's home bought, let's "chip" and buy a nice shiny cow bell and send it to Mr. Sheppard. I'm sure he would appreciate our kindness and just think how happy we'd make some gentle cow.—Ed.

BLUFORD, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Now I don't want my letter thrown aside for I want help, not for myself but for my aunt, who lives up in the hills, away from everybody, and is a lover of company. A few months ago she lost a little girl, nine years of age, the very light of her home; a few weeks ago she lost a tiny baby. Her little girl was such a bright, pretty little thing and was so much comfort; now she and the bright-eyed baby are gone.

What I want you to do is to write her letters of encouragement and sympathy, and sisters who have loved ones, don't fail to write, please, for you alone can understand fully. Send her good religious papers and good clean stories and I will be much your debtor. Her address is: Mrs. Lora Weems, Iuka, Ill.

If you could but see that broken-hearted mother weeping for her lost ones I know you would gladly grant my request. This is not a selfish letter; it has all been for someone else so please print it and I know it will bear good results. I have taken too much room for the rest of my letter to praise COMFORT very much but will say I count it one of my greatest blessings. I enjoy all the letters and would be glad to receive letters from girls of my own age. I am fourteen years old, have light hair, grey-blue eyes, fair complexion.

With lots of love, I am, LOIS MCCOMBS.

STATESVILLE, 756 Mulberry St., N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I wonder if you will make room for me to roll myself into your happy circle in my wheel chair and join you in your talks for a few minutes.

I am just a mere man, and an invalid at that, so I think you ladies will not accuse me of having any designs on you, even if I do like to be with you. I can hear some ask, "A mere man and an invalid, why should he want to intrude into our sacred corner where we have only permitted an old bachelor or two to come?" Another asks, "How do you know but what he is an old bachelor, too?" Another says, "I wonder how old he is, how long he has been an invalid and what he looks like?" Well Dear Sisters, just to quiet your whispering and satisfy your curiosity, I will give you a brief description of myself. To begin with, I am twenty-three years old, and at the time of the accident that caused my invalidism (which was six years ago last July) I weighed one hundred and thirty-five pounds, and was five feet, seven and one half inches high. I have dark hair (most people would call it black), dark brown eyes and fair complexion. I haven't walked any since the accident or been able to stand on my feet, in fact I can't so much as move a toe on either of my feet, and my hands are partly out of commission, only able to move a part of my fingers.

I can hear some say, "Poor fellow!" Yes, poor in this world's goods, I'll admit, but if you all could see me in my home you wouldn't think of me as poor in any other way. I always try to look on the bright side of life and when there is no bright side I generally make one, or try to, and I think that I succeed fairly well, at least my friends and neighbors very often compliment me on my sunny and cheerful disposition.

Do I hear some one say, "I wonder what he does to pass away the time?" Well, I'm never idle long at a time. I mainly do stenographic work for the general public, and as a side line I paint some pictures in water colors, also paint sofa pillow tops, piano scarfs, etc. The painting of sofa pillow tops and piano scarfs is a new art that I have recently taken up, and I find it a most fascinating pastime, and I must say that a sofa pillow top properly painted on canvas or velveteen is just as beautiful. I am arranging to have an exhibition of my paintings of pictures and pillow tops in the show windows at the store of a friend of mine some time soon.

Say there, Bachelor Bill, I think your idea on the family money is a pretty good one, tho' I am not

The Modern Farmer

Utilizing Marsh Soils

Millions of acres of waterlogged and boggy soil might and should be got to growing food crops as soon as possible. Good progress is being made in some states in this laudable direction and this is notable in Wisconsin, where experts have been steadily at work for some years interesting farmers in the work and seeing that it is intelligently done. Now large tracts of land, that recently were devoted to the production of frogs, muskrats and bullrushes, are producing excellent crops of corn, cabbage, onions, celery, clover and other forage plants, and on some of them we have seen fine crops of small grain. Readers of COMFORT who have wet tracts on their farms should have an expert determine if draining would pay and what the cost would be. Then they would be safe to borrow money on a mortgage to have the work done.

Here are some points by a Wisconsin soil expert which will help the reader to decide this matter. He says:

Five factors determine largely whether or not to drain and farm marsh land. These are: 1. The cost of thorough drainage. 2. The cost of clearing and breaking. 3. The chemical composition of the soil. 4. The danger of frost during the growing season; and 5, Whether the farm is all marsh or partly upland.

Thorough drainage usually costs from twenty to thirty-five dollars an acre. Clearing and breaking cost between five and twenty-five dollars an acre, depending largely on whether the marsh is open or timbered.

Marsh lands vary greatly in their chemical composition. Some need only to be drained to grow crops well, while others require special treatment. Marsh soils are subject to frost, which lessens their adaptability to corn and potatoes in central Wisconsin and prohibits success with these crops in northern counties.

When a farm is all or nearly all marsh it is imperative to drain thoroughly a portion of it, if not the entire area. On many farms having comparatively small marsh areas drainage is often overlooked because there is sufficient upland to meet the cropping needs and the marsh is left as pasture. Whenever the returns of such pasture lands are carefully considered, it becomes plain that they would prove much more profitable if made to grow "tame" crops of high feeding value rather than wild grasses of low feeding value.

It will pay as a rule to drain mucks and shallow peats having clay subsoils. Well decomposed peats underlaid by clay are much better than raw peats. Raw peats underlaid by sand are of less agricultural value. Bulletin No. 309 of the Wisconsin Experiment Station gives full advice on the subject.

Building Up a Worn-Out Farm

For several years now we have watched the process of restoring a worn farm to fertility and profitable crop production. The success of the enterprising owner should serve to encourage those who have like work to do and who are loath to start or impressed with the erroneous idea that it can't be done. It can! We have seen a big area of robbed, tired, depleted land made to "blossom like the rose." What this man has done others can do as well, provided they can get money enough to give it a good start. Bankers will accommodate a worthy farmer if they know that the cash advanced is to be expended for permanent improvements, livestock, fertilizers or feed. The modern banker, indeed, is working in harmony with the progressive farmer and helping him mightily in the work of improving his land that all concerned may reap the benefit. He understands now that bank funds come from the people and are the people's property of which he merely is the custodian and distributor. No great mercantile or manufacturing concern could exist were it not for accommodations by the bank when short-time funds are needed. The farmer has not understood this in the past, but is being taught it now and in many places is thus enabled to succeed where before he was constantly behind and consequently discouraged.

Stock feeding is absolutely necessary to the restoration of worn land to productiveness. Artificial fertilizers too often act merely as stimulants to a crop and make the land give up more and more of its resources until it "plays out" altogether and cannot produce a crop unless again and again heavily dosed with chemicals. Farmyard manure, from animals, is a permanent investment when placed on worn land. As an adjunct, artificial fertilizers, especially phosphates, potash and lime, are useful, while nitrogen is better derived from the constant growing of legumes and turning under of such plants in the green states. Our friend, mentioned in the first paragraph in this article, bought a big marl bed and put three tons of marl on each acre every three years and added a hundred pounds of ground phosphate rock to each load of manure sent out in the spreader. This fertilizer, together with the feeding of many dairy cows, clover and alfalfa growing, deep plowing and clean cultivation, have quickly made his big farm profitable. Others can do as well.

Clubwork for Farm Boys

We wonder if boys and girls who read COMFORT know what is going on in the big world around them as regards community clubs and "team" work!

So great is the present interest in this new departure of farm life that all over the country, clubs for the growing of grain and raising and feeding of foals, calves, pigs and lambs are being organized, and many of them that have been established for some time have proved wonderfully successful.

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," it has been said, and it is a wise and true saying. Farm work of the daily drudgery type tends to drive boys into the cities for more attractive clerical positions. Unending chores and toil in the fields scarcely can fail to become monotonous to young people when, as very often happens, they have no financial interest in the profits of their work, or receive little if any remuneration for their services. But the clubs to which we have alluded at once concentrate attention and interest in the production of better crops and animals, for the reason that rewards for work done are assured to the successful competitors in the form of cash prizes, trips to shows, free tuition, cups, medals, pedigreed seed or new animals with which to carry on the work. In addition there is the pleasing notoriety gained by the children who engage in the work. They find themselves noticed by their elders, and such attention stimulates them to well-directed effort, while success in the winning of prizes induces them to continue the good work. Then, as they grow older, they practice what they have learned in childhood, not to win prizes and approbation, but because they have proved that the better methods of farm practice and stock raising not only are profitable but become more and more fascinating and interesting as the years go by.

• Many farm boys who never had a cent to spare before they joined a corn raising or calf, pig or lamb club, now have an income of their own. The amount of thrift stamps and Liberty Bonds owned in the aggregate by boys who are doing agricultural club work is surprising. In one state, fifteen thousand club boys own bank accounts, club property and war securities, totaling $247,186, or $16 each. The fathers of many of these boys never had a bank account; now the "nest eggs" of club children, here and there over the land are inducing all farm folk to deposit their spare money in banks or invest in first-class securities.

Everything we have said applies with equal force to club work among girls. There are many instances, too, where clubs organized among the parents have had a similar influence.

We are, therefore, strongly in favor of these clubs for the old and young folks of the farm, and would advise our readers to write for literature on the subject to the agricultural experiment stations of their respective state and also to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Syrup from Barley

While barley can no longer be made into beer, it can be put to better use. The U. S. Department of Agriculture has just announced a new kind of syrup made from malt. It is said to have a very fine flavor and to be very sweet and palatable. Two things have brought about the attempt to make sugar from barley, the shortage of sugar and the prohibition law.

Malt syrup may be made from other grains besides barley; in fact, any plant containing starch, such as corn and potatoes. Malt syrup can be easily made in the breweries by making a few changes in equipment. It looks like maple syrup, and can be used for everything that sugar can be used for as a substitute for sugar. It is predicted that this syrup, which when developed on a commercial scale will be cheaper, will replace sugar for ordinary sweetening purposes. It is not expected that it will "drive sugar off the table" but it is thought that it will replace sugar for many sweetening purposes, particularly in the manufacture of soft drinks and sweet food products.

How Much Does a Cow Eat?

Who can tell offhand how much a good dairy cow eats in a year? Well, here it is. She eats a little more than her own weight in food every month of the year, or more than six tons of food besides one and a half acres of pasture. If the pasture is figured in at weight of green grass, it will run the total up to a ton a month!

A cow giving 7,000 of milk should eat not less than 2,000 pounds of grain, 3,000 pounds of hay, and 7,000 pounds of silage during the six winter months. In addition, she will drink about a ton and a half of water a month. All told, then, a cow will eat and drink about thirty tons of food and water in a year.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from the eminent specialists and experts of our Agricultural Staff on questions relating to farming, live stock and dairying.

Questions and Answers

TO RID HORSE OF WORMS.—I read in COMFORT about feeding molasses to stock. How much of the molasses mixture should be given the horse at a feed? One of my horses is thin in flesh and scaly between his hips and tail. I have tried several kinds of stock feed without helping his condition. He has a good appetite and eats well but gets thinner all the time. I think my horses have worms. Will the molasses rid them of worms, or must I use something else for this purpose? Can I feed the molasses mixed with corn chop, wheat bran and sorghum hay instead of with corn meal, wheat bran and cut hay? Is the molasses mixture hurtful to a pregnant mare?

C. T., Seguin, Texas.

A.—To destroy worms, mix in the feed night and morning for a week a tablespoonful of a mixture of two parts of table salt and one part each of flowers of sulphur and dried sulphate of iron; then stop for ten days and then repeat the treatment. Omit iron for a pregnant mare and increase sulphur and salt. Molasses will not remove or kill worms. The dose is one quart, night and morning, diluted with three quarts of hot water and mixed with ground feed of any suitable kind and cut hay. Continue it until the horse is in good condition. It will not hurt a pregnant mare. Do not feed sorghum hay.

DRYING OFF COWS.—Is it best to turn a cow dry for a short time before she is fresh? Does it injure her to be in milk until she comes in fresh?

MRS. H. H., Nebraska, Ind.

A.—A milch cow always should be "dried off" for at least six weeks before calving so that she may rest and store up material from which to form a full flow of milk when she calves. During the rest period she should take outdoor exercise every day and should be fed a light, laxative ration to keep her bowels active. Grain and silage should be reduced at least one half and bran and oilmeal fed rather than grain.

SOWING BARLEY.—Is there any difference between spring and fall barley? When is the best time to sow spring barley?

O. V. H., Skiatook, Okla.

A.—Rye and winter wheat may be sown in autumn, but barley and oats rarely are sown at that time. Sow barley in the spring as soon as danger of frost is past, selecting for the crop mellow, well prepared soil that has been top dressed and so is rich. Barley is a surface feeder and does best following a green crop that has been well manured. If extra manure is applied, harrow it into the top soil just before seeding or apply artificial fertilizer at seeding time.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

A. B., Richton, Miss.—Not many people are familiar with the facts concerning the "old twelve days" about which you inquire—and the resultant calendar mix-up which the "twelve days" are responsible for in history and chronology. In long ago B. C. 46, Julius Cæsar introduced what came to be called the Julian Calendar which established a year of 365¼ days with every fourth year to contain an added day—this constituting our Leap Year. Cæsar's well-thought-out calendar was a clever one, but as the Julian year was, in reality, 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes and 46 seconds, there was a constant error in reckoning of about 11 minutes each year. This, when the year 1582 rolled around, had mounted up to a time accumulation of ten days. Perhaps it was farmers, or poets, or even lovers—who call Spring their season—who made the most fuss in 1582, when it was discovered that the vernal equinox was occurring on March 11, and not March 21 as it properly should. Pope Gregory, in response to the protests, took the matter up with an astronomer named Clavius, and they arranged to straighten things out. Ten days were to be deducted from October by calling the fifth the fifteenth and going ahead as usual. Then Clavius also got up a scheme so this 11 minutes would not again accumulate into a disastrously large error. He had the Pope ordain that every hundreth year, such as 1800, 1900, etc., should not be reckoned as a Leap Year—excepting every four hundreth year beginning with the year 2000. In this way Clavius had it figured out that the difference between the natural and the calendar year would not amount to a day in 5000 years. Spain, Portugal and part of Italy accepted the plan and deducted the ten days. France subtracted her surplus ten from the tenth to the twentieth of December in the same year. Holland used December 15 to the 25th for this purpose, but the Protestant world hung back in following the orders of Rome. By 1751 the time error in Protestant countries had grown to 11 days, and during the reign of George II, England passed a bill in Parliament to equalize Britain's calendar with that of other countries by making September 2 of that year into September 14. Sweden promptly followed suit, but Russia still adhered to the old style until 1918, when Messrs. Lenine and Trotzky had the Bolshevist part of that suffering country adopt the Gregorian Calendar. Japan modernized her months in 1873, and the Chinese Republic in 1912, but Greece and the Balkan states yet use the old Julian system, which differs now by thirteen days from all almanacs in Richton, Miss.

A SUBSCRIBER, Claremore, Okla.—The most popular "sundaes" sold at soda fountains are chocolate, maple nut, fudge, marshmallow, and various fruit-flavored delights such as pineapple, strawberry, etc. Any high school girl could have told you this, we are certain. All of the flavors we mention are also sold in the form of plain and ice cream sodas. Root beer, grape juice, orangeade and phosphated drinks are also offered—besides many new and newly named drinks which have been concocted at fountains since the dry law went into effect.

O. T. H., Blainville, Tenn.—The Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., will supply you, upon application, with a list of such bulletins of the Department as are available for free distribution. These are too many for us to list here.

MRS. J. O. H., Mendon, O.—Write to COMFORT'S fur buyers whose names are in our advertising columns. They will give you the information you wish. Enclose a stamp for reply.

MRS. J. S. E., North Warren, Pa.—We believe the ill health of your gold fish is due to the water you are using and to the fish perhaps becoming chilled, either through the temperature of the room being too low or the water being too cold when placed in the bowl. You should use rain water or that obtained from a brook or spring. This water should be changed in part every few days, and, in winter should have any icy chill removed from it. The bowl should be occasionally placed in the sunlight, but not kept continuously in the sun. Do not, of course, leave the bowl in an unheated room during the night. The ordinary living-room temperature would be the most suitable. You are doing correctly in keeping some kind of a water plant in the aquarium and in feeding prepared food. Take care not to feed too much or too often.

W. H. Kent, 2119 Cadiz St., New Orleans, La.—Canaries are not difficult to keep in good health if scrupulous cleanliness is observed in the care of cage, and the water and feed dishes. The birds should be given a bath once a week and allowed occasional freedom in a closed room. Cold draughts must be avoided and the cage kept away from winter windows. Principal food should be canary grass seed, hemp seed and rape. Green leaves are a necessity, and these are best supplied in the form of chickweed. Sugar is good and may be given in small quantities, but acids—such as apples and other fruits—should be avoided in diet. Some lime is necessary and may be best furnished in the form of cuttlefish bone. In a state of nature, canaries are prolific and will breed several times a year. From four to six eggs are hatched at a time. Details of canary raising can be best studied in detail from such a book as Holden's "Canaries and Cage Birds," which can be ordered by any good book store which failed to have it in stock. This subscriber would be glad to hear from any COMFORT readers who have raised canaries.

W. M., Miles, N. C.—A photographer in any city would enlarge a photograph and frame it for you. Address the Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce in Raleigh for addresses of photographers in that North Carolina city.

W. L. S., Lewiston, Idaho.—The Cimex Lectularia is a persistent and ambitious breed of insect which is thought to have originated in India. After arrival in this country, the pest acquired a local habitation and a name and is now known simply as "bed bug." When the bugs are well established in walls and flooring, the room should be closed as tightly as possible and fumigated with sulphur candles which may be obtained of any druggist. All old wall paper and carpets should be removed. Ceilings and floor may be painted—using a large quantity of turpentine in mixing the paint. If this cannot be done, the walls and woodwork can be gone over with kerosene. What is known as pyrethrum powder is considered as a specific for direct application to bed and bedding. Persistence is necessary and more than one application will be needed. Old bedsteads should be painted. Write to U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., for free bulletin on "Bed Bugs."

MRS. W. S. McC., Rebecca, Ga.—See above answer to W. L. S.

J. W. W., Wolf Summit, W. Va.—Leigh is an English proper name and is pronounced "lay." (2) The present governor of Illinois is Frank O. Lowden. (3) Lightning was shown, by that early and enthusiastic scientist, Benjamin Franklin, to be simply a heavy electrical discharge. When between lower clouds and the earth, the flash is accompanied by thunder, but when the discharge takes place in the upper cloud region, the lightning is more diffused and the thunder is rarely heard. The thunder is generally supposed to be caused by the electrical discharge heating air and vapor to a high temperature, and the expansion and the after-contraction of the heated strata causes the noise which is heard as thunder. (4) We do not think, at the time your letter was dated, that you have allowed enough time for the furniture company to supply your needs. Your order has doubtless been filled by this time. If not, write this department again.

C. H., Darwin, Va.—An author may copyright anything he has written by addressing the Register of Copyrights, Library of Congress, Washington, D. C., and asking for an application for copyright. The fee is a small one and full directions will be sent with the application from Washington. (2) If you should own a farm which you chose to sell, the general public would not know what price you obtained for your property. In the same way, Mr. John Fox, Jr., and his publishers are the only persons who really know what profit Mr. Fox has made by the sale of his very popular book, "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine." The same ruling would apply to the other lesser known writers whose works you mention. Even a most successful novel nets its author a much smaller sum than is popularly supposed. If the story can be staged, or the "movie" rights sold, the author's pocketbook can be greatly helped.

competent to pass judgment, seeing that I am an old bach, too, or will be if I live long enough. As to hiring your better halves, I hardly think that would be necessary if hubby and wife understood each other as they should. Both should put their heads together and plan for the good of the family. I think that a man should talk over his business affairs with his wife and ask her advice on all business propositions, and if she is a woman that is worthy of being called a wife, she will appreciate it and do all that she can to help him. The thing that counts for the peace of mind and contentment in a home is perfect union between husband and wife and the best way to secure this, in my opinion, is by having faith in the wife and telling her of the worries and troubles and let her know the principles of business. Talk over the needs of the family and come to an agreement as to what is best. In this way you will come to an understanding, and by so doing will eliminate the friction that is apparent in most of the families with which we come in contact.

George L. Garrison, I heartily agree with you in regards to what you say about woman suffrage. You have expressed my view so thoroughly that it would be futile for me to try to improve on it.

Sisters, I have a sneaking idea that there are lots more of us Johns that read the Sisters' Corner than you may think, and enjoy it fine. I, for one, can say that I have been reading it for the past five or six years and have derived much pleasure therefrom. I have often thought of writing to this Corner but as it seemed to be only for the sisters, I have refrained from doing so until now.

If any one who reads this cares to write to me I would be only too glad to hear from them. But I must add if you want an answer you will have to enclose a stamp.

If you invite me, I may come again.

CLARENCE BEAM.

CALIFORNIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for over twenty years and enjoy the sisters' page very much.

I come to help June Rose with her son. Take him to an oculist and have his eyes fitted to glasses. Many a poor child suffers from eye trouble that could be corrected by properly fitting glasses. As a child of eight I should have had glasses but did not get them until I was twenty so I know what it means to do without them. All mothers that have cross and cranky children, and with no apparent reason, have their eyes examined. If I were a mother I would have my children's eyes examined before I sent them to school.

TRAINED NURSE.

WASHINGTON, 1024 17th St., N. W., D. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of your corner and now I have decided to come to you for help.

I have been thinking for some time of going West and taking a homestead claim but as I have only a few hundred dollars I do not know as I can count on being successful. Also, I do not know which state to choose.

Will not some of the sisters who have taken up claims or those who know about such, write me full particulars and advise me?

Owing to weak lungs I have been told by physicians to go West but cannot afford to do so except in this way.

Hoping to get the advice of some COMFORT sisters who have done the same, I am,

Sincerely, MRS. MARGARET CLARKE.

ASTORIA, 615 Irving Ave., ORE.

COMFORT SISTERS' CORNER:

I have taken COMFORT for several years, and certainly enjoy reading it, especially the letters; it makes one feel like a member of one big family.

I have never seen any letters from Astoria, which is situated at the mouth of the beautiful Columbia River, and has a harbor nearly seven miles in width. It was settled in 1811 by John Jacob Astor, and claims a population of thirty thousand people. Its chief industries are fishing, salmon canning and lumbering. We have a dozen or more canneries in operation during the fishing season from the first of May to the 25th of August. Astoria, as you know, is the home of the Royal-Chinook salmon which is shipped to all parts of the world. Then we have three large sawmills which are now in operation. We did have three large shipyards, but they closed down after the war was over. We also have a million dollar municipal dock, and a flour mill which has recently been enlarged.

Easy to Make This Pine Cough Remedy

Thousands of families swear by its prompt results. Inexpensive, and saves about $2.

You know that pine is used in nearly all prescriptions and remedies for coughs. The reason is that pine contains several peculiar elements that have a remarkable effect in soothing and healing the membranes of the throat and chest. Pine is famous for this purpose.

Pine cough syrups are combinations of pine and syrup. The "syrup" part is usually plain granulated sugar syrup.

To make the best pine cough remedy that money can buy, put 2½ ounces of Pinex in a pint bottle, and fill up with home-made sugar syrup. Or you can use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup. Either way, you make a full pint—more than you can buy ready-made for three times the money. It is pure, good and very pleasant—children take it eagerly.

You can feel this take hold of a cough or cold in a way that means business. The cough may be dry, hoarse and tight, or may be persistently loose from the formation of phlegm. The cause is the same—inflamed membranes—and this Pinex and Syrup combination will stop it—usually in 24 hours or less. Splendid, too, for bronchial asthma, hoarseness, or any ordinary throat ailment.

Pinex is a highly concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, and is famous the world over for its prompt effect upon coughs.

Beware of substitutes. Ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with directions, and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

ISN'T this a queer old world—and a good old world? Most of the women I know are busy cleaning house and have their clothes-line full of rugs and draperies from which Friend Husband is busily engaged beating the dust and smoke that has accumulated during the winter months. It must be a grand and glorious feeling to have F. H. say in a masterful tone, "Here, dear, let me do that; you aren't strong enough for such heavy work," and then when he finishes, view a line full of dustless rugs. But I don't believe it can compare with the thrill I receive when some dear girl writes me a letter of thanks for helping her untangle some knotty problem of her life. After all, single blessedness is not without its compensations.

TWO RED HEADS, Ind. (R. H. No. 1.).—The fact that she won't allow you to kiss her proves that she is a nice girl, as you say she is. The only way to find out whether she loves you well enough to marry you, is to ask her. Faint heart ne'er won fair lady. But don't feel too badly if she refuses you for a boy of nineteen is altogether too young to be engaged. (R. H. No. 2). Just because you "intend to ask her to marry me soon," doesn't give you the right to expect all of her time and affection. Maybe she isn't a mind reader. Ask her first and if you haven't courage enough to do that I hope she throws you over for a fellow with more gumption than you possess.

WORRIED LITTLE GIRL, S. Dak.—Don't worry, my dear, because you are a trifle large for your age. A person grows only so much and if you tend "right smart" (as our southern cousins say) to growing now you'll have it over with and can devote your energies to something else, conscious that the matter of your growth has been taken care of. Eat plenty of nourishing food, drink lots of water and take regular exercise. Don't stoop, as so many people do, thinking they make themselves look shorter. High heels are injurious to the health and, besides, they make a person look taller so don't wear them. Wear your skirts to your shoe tops or an inch or two above and braid your hair in regular little-girl style. You are a little girl, so dress and act like one. You've got more years in which to be "grown up" than you have to be a little girl. I know.

SUNSHINE, So. Carolina.—Just keep right on being a sweet, modest little girl and study hard. You are too young to have a regular beau, but if your parents don't object, I can see no harm in remaining ordinary friends with the soldier boy you mention. If you want to be more than friends when you are older, that will be your business. Don't go too often to his sister's home. People will talk anyway, so give them as little opportunity as possible.

WORRIED, Vermont.—I dislike very much to advise a girl to go contrary to her mother's wishes and particularly a foster-mother to whom the girl is indebted for a home and a mother's care. An unselfish mother would want her daughter to marry and have children of her own, and she is wrong when she preaches against marriage. If she is old and dependent upon you for care and support, it is your duty to give her all that she gave you, but if she isn't alone in the world, or without sufficient money you have a right to happiness and at your age should be capable of judging what is best for you.

WORRIED BABY, Trussville, Ala.—Yours is rather a difficult question to answer. The average engaged girl rather likes to have her fiance take her in his arms, just as much as he likes to do it, and your fiance is justified in feeling hurt because you refuse. On the other hand, you are equally justified in thinking him inconsiderate of your wishes when he insists. Do you really dislike it or is it mostly because your father and mother object? If the idea is really objectionable to you, I'd advise you, for your future happiness and his, to think twice before marrying a man with an affectionate disposition.

APHRODITE, Colo.—You and your sister should comb your hair the way other little girls your own age comb their hair. Your letter wasn't explicit enough for further instructions.

TROUBLED LITTLE GIRL, W. Va.—Your parents should change your boarding place, but if they don't do that and your cousin persists in annoying you, you should give him a "biff in the eye."

BLANCHE, Okla.—I am glad you want to do better, for the world at large is more censorious of the young girl alone than the girl with parents and brothers to stand up for her, and you can't be too careful. It may not be wrong for your escort to put his arm over the back of your seat at the theater, but it is unnecessary and doesn't look well. (2) You are too young to be out so late, though if you are it is better to have eight in the party than just two; but don't have so many that it will be necessary to put your arm around a boy, just to make more room in the car. It's wonderful what imagination will do! (3) Doctors are often called from churches but it is done by an usher and in a quiet manner, and people understand why, but it was making you altogether too conspicuous to have a young man come to the church door and call for you. You should have told him you didn't like it. I'll bet the church gossips had the time of their lives talking about it. That's as many questions as I can answer at one time.

E. B. G., Spokane, Wash.—I'd like very much to have a good heart-to-heart talk with your father and mother. Why, oh, why, won't fathers and mothers in general, see that if their daughters aren't allowed to entertain their boy friends in their own homes, there is a chance that they'll meet them elsewhere! Your parents are losing a golden opportunity of keeping your confidence and being pals to you, but be patient and perhaps they'll do better later on. They mean the very best for you; so forgive them. All this talk of parents forgiving their children should be reversed occasionally and children should forgive their parents for unintentional wrongs done them.

RENA, Ky.—There is no charge and you may ask three questions each month. Read answer to E. B. G., which partly answers your questions. Wait a year, then if you are as much in love with each other as you think you are now, it will be time enough to think of marriage.

MYRTLE, Okla.—White is the regulation color for brides to wear, but if you are to be married in a traveling suit, it could be of any becoming color. As I've said before, I'm partial to dark blue.

BILLY, Sandy Bend, Ark.—I appreciate your mother's confidence in me and agree with her that you are too young to do your hair up. Brush it every day, keep it clean and comb it in some little-girl way. (2) You aren't too old to play with dolls. (3) No beaux until you are eighteen, at least.

MARGARET, Ohio.—It is only common courtesy to ask a guest, man or woman, to call again, though you might leave it to your boy caller to set the exact date; that gives you an opportunity to find out how anxious he is to see you again.

HEART-BROKEN SISTERS, Iowa.—Now that you realize the seriousness of your act it doesn't seem necessary for me to caution you against a repetition—anyway, D-O-N-T! If you are sure of yourselves and your companions it won't be necessary for you to give up their friendship or love.

UNSETTLED, Oregon.—"Should a lady who has a dance promised to one partner dance it with another just because he asks after the first?" She isn't a lady if she does that. Ladies always keep their promises, but they don't make rash or imprudent promises.

There, my dusting (mental dusting) for the month is done and I'll sit back and wait for what the April showers bring.

Tied and Dyed

To Produce Fancy Effects in Home Dyeing

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THESE are the sane and sensible times when a woman no longer boasts of how much she spent on her attractive rooms, but how little. A generation ago she spent more on one piece of furniture than she spends now on all the furniture in the room, and was as proud of her extravagance then as she is now of her economy.

In just one word there lies the secret of artistic effects resulting from economical efforts, and that word is "Draperies." Pretty draperies make a room, and inartistic draperies mar it. The outlay on mahogany furniture cannot be so great that an ugly curtain will not cheapen the effect.

Silks, wools, chintz, percales and reps have an unhappy way of fading, and as all these materials are steadily advancing in price, the clever woman has had to resort to dyes to replace them, and in no other method of dyeing may she hope to achieve as original and artistic effects as in tying and dyeing, an old-new art.

This process has been used in many parts of the world. Some interesting examples of it are found among the textiles from the so-called Inca graves in Peru and Bolivia, dating back to the sixteenth century. Some extremely interesting specimens of tied work can be seen in the Philippine collection in the New York Museum of Natural History, brought from the Bagobo tribe in Mindanao.

These specimens show marvelous patience and ingenuity, and are generally made of thin, flimsy muslin, most elaborately decorated in three or four colors with patterns made up of an infinite number of small round or rectangular rings of white or light colors, against a darker background. In the modern application the process is easier, and almost as artistic.

The beginner should use cheese-cloth, or its equivalent in texture and price. Gather a small circle of the goods, as much as would cover a marble, and tie with a stout cord. Many have found that to actually tie a marble in the goods produces a uniform effect. These circles may be tied in a regular band the length or width of the material, or tied promiscuously. Then, when this is done, the material is dipped in dye, and hung up to dry. When thoroughly dried, the strings are cut and a small circle of a lighter shade is found. One woman, who could not afford yellow chintz or silk for a north bedroom, tied and dyed all the draperies in her room, first taking the original color out with lye. When developed, there was a beautiful effect in yellow with big white circles scattered here and there in what might be called impressionist fashion.

Another woman, noting that the sun had faded her curtains, couch hangings and rugs from a deep blue to a paler shade, tied and dyed in a deep blue. The rings were of the original pale blue, and stood out beautifully against the deeper background.

The economic possibilities of tied and dyed in old material are more than equalled by the artistic results in new goods. A young girl had white China silk given her for a dress. She did not want a white dress, but she needed a new garment. She tied and dyed the silk, using the palest shades, and the result was a texture almost opalesque in its attractive coloring.

"And the best of it is," she said, "no other girl has, or can have, a dress just like it. I couldn't duplicate it myself if I were to try."

Astoria is a peninsula and is almost entirely surrounded by water. We have the Columbia River on the north and Young's Bay on the south.

This is a great country for wild flowers and wild berries. It is great fun to go in the woods and pick them. We have huckleberries, salmon berries and thimble berries. You should taste some of our huckleberry pies. They are delicious.

We have two summer resorts here. Seaside on the Oregon side, and Long Beach on the Washington side. People from all parts of the country come to these resorts to spend their vacations, and to bathe in the Pacific Ocean.

We have three forts at the mouth of the Columbia River, that are well fortified. They are Ft. Columbia and Ft. Canby on the Washington side and Ft. Stevens on the Oregon side. There were thousands of soldiers stationed here during the war.

The climate is beautiful during the summer time, and it very seldom reaches ninety degrees. The winters are mild.

Most people have the impression that this is a wild country but such is not the fact as they are no Indians in this part at all. The only Indians to be found are in Eastern Oregon, especially around Pendleton.

I would be pleased to hear from some of the COMFORT sisters.

LAURA DANIELSON.

DREW, MISS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

After reading September COMFORT I had to write and send a few words of encouragement. Oh! if we would only learn to live one day at a time, there would be fewer of us asking advice from our stronger sisters. It seems sometimes a hard lesson to learn. There are dark days when we feel there cannot possibly be a bright side to anything. Yet there is, always, and we can find it if we search. There are times when the hope that was dearest to us turns to ashes as an outstretched hand almost touches it; when our loved ones, and friends upon whom we would have counted most, prove disloyal. When all of our efforts meet defeat we are ready to give up in despair. There is one great sorrow in life that no irreverent hand can touch lightly. It is the sacrifice we have to make on the altar of our love, and whether this sacrifice be made for the living or dead, it is a real sorrow, but much of what we worry over, grieve over, fret over, much that causes sleepless nights on tear-stained pillows, should be met with greater bravery, stronger control.

Now to "A Sister" who wanted to know if she must leave her husband or stay on. Stay on, by all means. Live "one day at a time; 'tis the natural way, of bearing life's burdens and cares day by day." I am sure your husband would not be happy with you away and you would never, never be. Learn to live one day at a time, so that you may conquer the smaller worries that come up daily. Just in proportion as we conquer the smaller things of life will we triumph over the big ones. In the years to come it will not be the bitter but the sweet we will wish to live over again. So then, as we all go journeying onward o'er life's mysterious highway, let us be ever looking for the roses and when we find the thorns, as we all do and will continue to do as long as the world stands, let us meet them in the armor of patience and at last we can say as all true conquerors can, "I have fought a good fight."

Now to "Wife in Name Only," perhaps a part of my little "preachment" will help you. I wish you and "A Sister" would both write me a personal letter. Will some of the sisters please write.

MRS. WALTER HENDERSON.

MUNN, COLO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have come to contribute my mite, in part payment, for all the helps I have obtained from our corner in the past.

To all, young and old, big and small, who are troubled with hernia or rupture I wish to tell how I cured my little boy at the age of three months and again when he was six. I noticed it first when he was three months old and one doctor advised an operation and another said use a truss and wait until he is older. I took his advice and all who have had the experience know what followed; for fifteen months I watched him constantly. Then an old lady told me to remove the truss and apply witch hazel to the abdomen, night and morning and oftener if possible. A druggist told her son this and he had cured himself and he had been ruptured twelve years. I tried it and in six weeks my baby did not need any truss and had no more trouble until he was six years old when he tried his strength by lifting a bag of popcorn which brought back the old trouble. I was afraid I could not cure him as easily as when he was younger as the rupture was so bad I could not get it back into place. I took him to the doctor and he replaced it and fitted a truss. He gave me no hope and said the sooner he was operated on the better and then I told him how I had cured him before and he said he had never heard of a case being cured in that way. I tried it again and in three weeks my boy went to school without a truss and has never worn one since. He is past eight now. Get a truss that will keep rupture in place and do not get discouraged if it slips back of the truss occasionally for it will do that until the opening closes. Simply remove the truss and lie with the feet and hips elevated and it will gradually work into place. Do not wear truss at night unless the patient is very bad or has a cough.

If anyone wishes to write me for further explanation I will answer all who send stamped envelopes.

We live half way between Denver, Colo., and Cheyenne,

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. S. W., Clark's Summit, Pa.—Lumps in the breast, large or small, are always to be dealt with surgically. However, as the lump is small, you might continue the use of iodine locally, and take, internally, five drops of the syrup of iodide of iron, well diluted.

MISS F. K., Ellsworth, Kansas.—Your condition may be due to hemorrhoids, or may be a blind external fistula. In any case, you should be examined, and the exact condition ascertained in this manner. If the condition is a blind external fistula, the sooner it is relieved, surgically, the better. If, on the other hand, it is an extruding hemorrhoid, an operation also is indicated. Advertised cures for this condition are always speculative, and, in the long run, the hemorrhoids (another name for piles) are made worse; become intolerable, and are only relieved by operation.

MRS. M. B. P., Hilbert, Wis.—Goitre affects the circulation, and any pressure over the heart, as lying on the left side, may cause the pain and discomfort you mention. Lie on the right side always, or on back. The tumor should be removed at once.

MISS E. J., Danville, Wash.—Your trouble is due, no doubt, to lack of cleanliness. Have your teeth cleaned and wash out the mouth with Dobell's solution. You may have, also diseased tonsils, as well as adenoids. Have them looked after.

MRS. W. C. F., Florence, S. C.—Try brewer's yeast for the boils. A teaspoonful after meals will do.

MISS R. B., Napoleonville, Pa.—The trouble with your father is, as you suspect, Bright's disease. There is no cure for him at his age. Simply continue the milk diet as suggested by your physician and await the result. There is no help for him.

W. A. O., Dublin, Ind.—Try an enema of ordinary table salt for the pin worms. A teaspoonful to the pint will be about the right strength. Use the enema about three times a week.

J. H. B., Rising Star, Tex.—Your trouble is probably eczema. Apply at night, to the parts, Lassar's Paste, to which has been added thirty grains of boracic acid to the ounce.

MRS. M. K., Sellenburg, Ind.—Your trouble is probably Bright's disease. You should live on a milk diet, and take some ferruginous tonic such as Basham's mixture. Take a teaspoonful in water after meals.

MISS M. M., Bartly, N. D.—Weak coating of the veins causes your trouble. You should wear constantly a flannel bandage on both legs. You should also take some good tonic containing iron.

MISS A. L. C., Clyde, N. Y.—Go to your druggist and get Dobell's solution. Druggists have it made up and all ready to dispense. The protruding piles should be operated on at once.

MRS. B. B, Pensacola, Fla.—Constipation due to carelessness in the past years accounts for most of the symptoms given. Your daughter should take regular exercise, and get rid of the gas in the transverse colon and the descending colon. This can be accomplished by giving her large, and high up, colonic irrigations. The irrigations should be made of warm water to which has been added a teaspoonful of salt to the quart of hot water.

MISS A. C., Fremont, Nebr.—Your trouble is not a disease. The only thing for you to do is to have the hairs removed from the face by electrolysis. This can only be done by some good doctor.

MISS A. M. D., Avar, Ill.—Goitre has nothng to do with your irregular menstruation. Use a vaginal douche of salt and water. Use one teaspoonful of salt to the quart of water.

MRS. R. L. R., Chureno, Tenn.—Malaria may be the real cause of your entire trouble. The blood probably comes from the stomach. The shortness of breath is also due undoubtedly to indigestion. You had better take some two-grain capsules of quinine, three or four times a day, keep your bowels open, and live on a semi-solid diet for a while. You might also take a teaspoonful of American Oil with your meals.

MRS. C. L. N., Rochester, Washington.—No doubt, the "change of life", so called, is beginning. One of the best remedies for nervousness, and the consequent nervous dyspepsia due to this change, is assafoetida pills, in five-grain doses, after meals. Your bladder trouble should be attended to at once. The bladder should be douched with a weak solution of permanganate of potash—about a teaspoonful of a saturated solution to the pint of water—is the proper strength. Besides the douching, you can take five-grain doses of urotropin after meals. As to diet, a simple diet of semi-solid food is indicated. Oatmeal gruel, milk, buttermilk, and any cereal that agrees with you, can be added to the list. Besides, you should be examined and ascertain in this way the condition of the local organs. Possibly you have an external laceration as well as a laceration of the womb that can be remedied by operation. Of course, keep the bowels open and drink plenty of good spring water, enough to flush out the kidneys.

MR. H. A., Sulphur Springs, Ark.—For a man of your years, sixty, a lump anywhere is dangerous, and should be removed by operation. Malignant changes are apt to take place in lumps of this kind, and result fatally, if not excised.

Wyo. Our nearest town is Munn, ten miles away. We homesteaded here ten years ago. I am a French Yankee. My husband is a German; he came across when he was sixteen and he is just as much of a Yankee as I am. I went to school in the town of Pinconning, Michigan, and would welcome letters from any of my old schoolmates who read this.

In my next letter will tell what wonders olive oil has worked in my big family of six.

MRS. TERESA COURIER KOHLMAN.

ALBERTA, CANADA.

GOOD AFTERNOON, MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT a good many years, ever since I can remember. In answer to Tillamook Bayreader will say that I think if she would think more of hubby and less about that education she would be better off. I had very little schooling, only one term the winter I was seven years old, but do I worry? I should say not!

I am the mother of three dear babies, two girls, Erma May, age five, and Mabel Maxine, age three, and Miles Henry, fifteen months old. My husband is a trapper. We are in the Canadian wilds about 150 miles north and west of Edmonton, Alta. Our cabin is in the valley of the Sundance Creek. Now sisters, do not smile when I say that every morsel of food and every stick of furniture we have was packed about 400 yards down a mountain-side. My husband and an Indian packed it all down on their backs, enough food to last our family of five, five months and furniture enough to furnish two rooms. I just wish that the sisters who are worrying because they do not love their hubbies or their hubbies don't love them, could peek in on my little family. They would be ashamed of themselves. Look at the beautiful things in this world and you cannot help but be happy. Do not think if you could only do this, that or the next thing, you would be happy. Instead just think how grateful you are for the good things the Lord has given you and be contented.

How many of the sisters bake birthday cakes for each member of the family when their birthday arrives? I do, even little Miles had his cake when he was one year old and fancy the smile on daddy's face when little Erma set a cake on the table with thirty-five candles on it. I suppose some of you will think I am foolish but I do not. We had a lovely time. Tomorow is my birthday and how busy my girlies are. I had to make the cake, of course, but they helped me or thought they did and such fun as they will have lighting the twenty-five candles.

I will write again and tell you about my life in the Canadian wilds, the land of moose and mystery.

MRS. MIKE.

RICHMOND, 1529 Second Ave., VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND EVERY SISTER:

original purpose, make excellent rings in the kitchen on which to set hot dishes. They save work and finish.

IN POLISHING TABLE TOPS it requires a strong arm and a heavy polisher. All this may be made easier by covering a heavy flatiron with old woolen cloth, winding it smoothly around several times and sewing it solidly.

DO NOT THROW AWAY white or ecru linen window shades when they are past service at the windows. Soak through several cold waters to which a little sal-soda has been added. Then wash in good strong suds and boil. You will find many uses for the cloth.

IF YOUR CELLARWAY IS DARK, lose no time in painting the top and bottom step a light color. It may save the old folks from falling.

AN EFFECTIVE WAY TO AVOID FALLS, is by pasting surgeon's adhesive plaster, the adhesive side outward, to the soles of the rubbers.

RAIN-WATER FOR HOUSE PLANTS.—Maybe it is the use of hard water in watering your plants that causes failures. Try saving rain-water for this purpose.

IF SOOT FALLS UPON THE RUG or carpet, sprinkle heavily with salt or cornmeal before trying to sweep it up. Use a whisk hand brush, and after the greater part has been removed, repeat the process for thorough cleaning.

IN BUYING A STAIR CARPET, it is economy to buy the length of one more tread than is necessary. Let this end run under a rug, and when the carpet is cleaned, slide it along a few inches to change the wear.

SAVE ALL THE OLD SPOOLS to slip over nails before driving them into the closet walls. Especially useful is this arrangement in damp climates where rust spots appear from contact with metal.

STOVE CEMENT.—Equal parts of salt and hard wood ashes mixed with water to form a paste will effectively cement cracks in a stove.

PARAFFIN PAPER.—Make sheets of paraffin paper by running sheets of thin white or brown paper through hot paraffin. Use these to cover food with in cold places. In ice boxes, the paper prevents "sweating" of the food.

LOCATION OF MIRRORS.—Change the location of mirrors if the rays of the sun strike them as the sun injures the silvering, causing a mottled appearance.

CLEANING BRISTLE BRUSHES.—When the hair bristles become soft from long use in the carpet-sweeper, floor, or hand brushes, put a little baking soda into some hot water, and in this solution work the brushes in and out until thoroughly cleaned. Dry them in hot sun.

SOAPSTONE SINKS should be treated to one or more coats of linseed oil before being used. The oil improves the appearance of the soapstone, besides making a surface that is easily kept clean.

EXTENSION TABLE LOCK.—If your extension dining table does not lock when the extra leaves are out, put a screw-eye and hook into the frame underneath for fear it may be pulled from one side when covered with dishes.

WHEN DUSTING, carry two dusters; a clean one for photos, white surfaces, etc., and one with a little furniture polish on it for dark wood and furniture.

DRAWERS THAT BIND.—Rubbing a bar of hard soap over the running edges of bureau drawers and on the strip on which they run will usually prevent "hitching" when they are pulled out. Soap will also prevent screens from sticking if rubbed on both screen and screen strip.

GREASE THE SNOW SHOVEL.—Before starting in to shovel snow, first apply a liberal coating of grease to the shovel and see how much easier it cuts into the snow.

OLD BROOMS.—There seem to be many uses for old brooms. One is to cut off the handle six inches from the broom and trim it squarely to within four inches of the stitching. At the end of a back step bore a hole that will just admit the broom handle and you have an excellent scraper for muddy boots. Another use is to trim the broom short and squarely, cover it securely with a soft floor cloth and use it to polish linoleum or oilcloth.

OLD NEWSPAPERS.—Many thicknesses of newspapers under carpets or mattings will save much wear, prevent moths, keep out much cold, besides making them softer to walk on.

MEDIUM-COARSE SANDPAPER removes the roughness from stew-pans and kettles and prevents their "catching" next time.

Clothing Prices Reduced by Large Manufacturer.

CHICAGO,—Mr. James D. Bell, head of the Bell Tailors, Adams at Green St., Chicago, Ill., said to be the largest made-to-measure clothing establishment in the world, recently stated that his firm is now able to quote prices on spring and summer suits 35 per cent below what others ask. To prove his point he showed the writer a very attractive piece of all wool cassimere for which they ask only $25 a suit, made to individual measure, whereas the same fabric is now being offered by others at $35 to $40 per suit. Even larger savings are offered on their higher priced suits. Every reader of COMFORT should write Mr. Bell for his price list and a free copy of his style book No. 682 which contains large cloth samples of many beautiful patterns.—Adv.

No More Wrinkles

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE

Superfluous Hair Vanishes Like Magic. Eyelashes Beautified

Pimples and Blackheads Removed Forever

Let this woman send you free, everything she agrees, and beautify your face and form quickly.

This clever woman has not a wrinkle upon her face; she has perfected a marvelous, simple method which brought a wonderful change in her face. For removing wrinkles, her method is truly wonderfully rapid.

She made herself the woman she is today and brought about the wonderful change in her appearance in a pleasant manner. Her complexion is as clear and fair as that of a child. She had thin, scrawny eye-lashes and eyebrows, which could scarcely be seen, and she made them long, thick and beautiful by her own methods and removed every blackhead and pimple from her face.

Nothing is taken into the stomach, no common massage, no harmful plasters, no worthless creams.

By her new process, she removes wrinkles and develops the whole figure plump and fat.

It is simply astonishing the hundreds of women who write in regarding the wonderful results from this new beauty treatment, which is beautifying their face and form after beauty doctors and other methods failed. She has thousands of letters on file like the following.

Mrs. M. L. B. Albin, Miss., writes: "I have used your beauty treatment with wonderful success. I have not a wrinkle on my face now and it is also improving my complexion, which has always troubled me with pimples and blackheads. My weight was 112 pounds before taking your treatment and now I weigh 117, a gain of 5 pounds. Your treatment is a God send to all thin women. I am so grateful you may even use my letter if you wish."

The valuable new beauty book which Madame Clare is sending free to thousands of women is certainly a blessing to women.

All our readers should write her at once and she will tell you absolutely free; about her various new beauty treatments and will show our readers:

How to remove wrinkles in 8 hours;
How to make long, thick eyelashes and eyebrows;
How to remove superfluous hair;
How to remove blackheads, pimples and freckles;
How to remove dark circles under the eyes;
How to quickly remove double chin;
How to build up sunken cheeks and add flesh to the body;
How to darken gray hair and stop hair falling;
How to stop forever perspiration odor.

Simply address your letter to Helen Clare, Suite A 279, 3311 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill., and don't send any money, because particulars are free, as this charming woman is doing her utmost to benefit girls or women in need of information which will add to their beauty and make life sweeter and lovelier in every way.

Prisoners of the Storm

"Sho now! Why shouldn't she? I acted up kind of rough at first. I didn't know what nice girls they were that was coming into the valley. Why shouldn't I be a little bit neighborly, now't your little house has prob'ly saved my carcass from the wolves?"

Jessica shivered.

"Oh, don't talk about that, please. Of course, anyone would take a man in out of the blizzard. We'll be glad—or I will anyway—to know that you won't be trying to drive us out; but Laura's awful set. She never'll take any help from you—or from anyone, for that matter."

"You've likely heard some pretty rough yarns about me."

"No, really—at least, not that, I believe. Oh, I was forgetting. You must be hungry."

"Why, yes, maybe; though I hadn't thought of it. I'm mighty well off, I guess, for a stormy night like this."

Jessica rose with a burning blush, and confusedly set about the preparations for supper. In half an hour bacon and cornbread, potatoes and coffee were smoking on the little table. The ranchman ate silently. His weather-tanned countenance had now a high flush as of fever or wine; and his handsome eyes followed eagerly Jessica's every movement. She endeavored to make conversation on indifferent subjects, but with poor success; and she hardly touched her food. Her mind was a whirl of conflicting emotions. One instant she was wishing her visitor away, and the next was wildly glad of his presence. Now she feared or almost hated him, thinking of the futility of the old carving knife hidden in the bedroom as a weapon against so powerful and agile an antagonist; and now she trembled with joy to think that her little house and its fire had lain in the track of his storm-bewildered wanderings and saved him from a miserable death. Vividly recurring in the panorama of her wild and whirling thoughts was her amazement at herself.

When the dishes had been cleared away and the fire replenished, they sat on opposite sides of the table, Jessica at work on some rough sewing, and Steele smoking or sitting back with half-closed eyes, listening to the roar of the storm and watching her busy and nervous fingers. At times the silence in the little room became tense, and the girl ventured some commonplace remark in the hope of gaining some measure of reassurance. To these Steele replied briefly and civilly; then returned to his meditations. As Jessica bent over her work she could feel his gaze glowing on her cheek and neck like a beam of midsummer sun. When she raised her head and met his eyes, he turned away or rose and resumed his lion-like pacing. In the lulls of the wind the little clock on the mantel ticked loudly.

At eleven o'clock Jessica had been sitting for half an hour with her work untouched in her lap. Her face was white with weariness. Steele rose and came toward her with a strange awkwardness in his movements. She gazed up at him, stifling the cry that rose to her lips.

"Now, Miss Jessica," he said, in a strange, tense voice, "you go into your room there and go to bed. I'll bunk down here before the stove and keep guard. I guess there won't be any burglars break in tonight, though."

"All right," replied the girl tremulously. "Let's see what we can find in the way of coats and blankets so you can be somewhere near comfortable."

"Don't worry too much about that. I'll be all right. I'm used to roughing it. And you'll want to be sure and have plenty of things on your bed tonight. It'll be cold in there."

Jessica bustled about the cabin, found some sacks and an old rough coat of her own and brought one of the pillows from the bedroom. These things, with Jeffrey's fur coat, made a passable bed; but he insisted on knowing that Jessica would have ample covering before he accepted them. Bidding him good night in a voice scarcely audible, she closed the door of the bedroom, leaving her visitor smoking, with apparent calmness, a last pipeful by the stove. A few minutes later she heard him disposing his long limbs on the makeshift couch.

For an hour she lay listening to the storm-wind, her heart beating rapidly and her mind a thoroughfare for a procession of bewildering visions. Fear was there in horrid shapes and bold defiance—and a strange tremulous tenderness. There was no lock or bolt on the bedroom door, merely a hook that would certainly not withstand the shove of a powerful shoulder. The futile old carving knife was under her pillow; but she well knew that she could never turn its point against the man who now lay a scant four paces from her bed. Against herself rather—if worse came to worse! That would be far, far better. Already she could not bear to think of any harm coming to him, far less of herself inflicting pain and death. Her own life could be sacrificed if need be. What did it matter?

She had fallen into a doze when she was roused by hearing the young ranchman moving about in the living-room. A chair was moved, and she heard the stove door opened and closed. His steps approached her door, and receded. Then for half an hour she could hear no sounds save those of the storm without. At last her weary young body had its way, and she fell into a deep and dreamless sleep.

She was awakened by the sounds which Jeffrey was making in replenishing the fire in the living-room, and by the dim morning light which came from the half-window. The snow had ceased falling, but the wind howled as furiously as ever, tugging at the drifts and whirling blinding clouds of flakes across the plain. The sky overhead was a dingy grey, verging to a greenish-black near the horizon, with not a hand's breadth of blue anywhere. She dressed hurriedly, and pulling open the door, greeted her visitor with a tremulous good morning.

Jeffrey looked up with a smile, and replied in a manner less constrained than that of the previous evening. He insisted that his bed had been "plenty good enough," but a haggard and drawn look about his eyes belied his words. He worked with quick and nervous motions replacing the garments that had formed his couch and bringing more fuel from the shed. Already he had a good fire, and the teakettle was beginning to simmer. The preparations for breakfast went forward, Jessica working hurriedly and anxiously and declining the offers of assistance made by the young ranchman.

When they were seated on opposite sides of the table. Jeffrey immediately noticed that his hostess in serving the meal had dealt out the portions very unevenly, heaping his plate with the wherewithal to satisfy a robust appetite, and placing only an invalid's portion on her own.

"What's the matter?" he demanded. "Aren't you feeling well?"

"Oh, yes, I feel well enough," answered Jessica, flushing guiltily.

"You're not eating enough to keep a chicken alive. What's the matter?"

"Oh, I'm all right. Some days I don't eat much."

Jeffrey's eyes searched her countenance. Apparently he was not satisfied with what he found there, for he quickly rose, and went to the little storage cupboard and the boxes in the corner of the room where the Ballantynes kept their provisions. After a minute's search he came back to the table with a new, stern look on his face.

"I thought so," he said gravely. "Your provisions are running low, and it was your idea to starve yourself and give me plenty. Now here——"

He seized her plate with its pitiful fragments, and placing it beside the bacon dish which she had pushed to his side of the table for his second helping, quickly deposited upon it the two slices of bacon and the one remaining segment of cornbread. Then he carried the plate around and set it before her.

"Now eat," he said, briefly.

"But really," she protested, "I'm not very hungry."

"Eat your breakfast," he said curtly, "then we'll talk."

Jessica obediently ate the portions assigned her, wondering the while why she made no more determined protest. When she had finished Jeffrey renewed the discussion in a tone of reproof.

"That was a nice thing for you to do,—letting me go on eating like a horse, and with no more idea where the next meal was coming from."

"There'll be plenty—as soon as Laura gets back," returned the other faintly. She couldn't manage to meet his eyes.

"Yes, but do you realize that she may not be able to get through for a week?"

"Oh! You don't think so, do you?"

"You can't tell. The drifts are pretty deep, and it isn't clear overhead yet. It might be a week before anyone could get through from Cartersville."

Jessica gazed helplessly out of the window at the whirling drifts.

"There's enough meal to make another plate of cornbread," she said, "but the bacon and the potatoes are gone."

"That's it!" exclaimed Jeffrey, rising quickly, "You've got just about enough for one person for one day."

"I didn't realize till I came to get breakfast," said Jessica, guiltily.

"Oh, you're not to blame, except for not telling me as soon as you did realize. It's wonderful the things women will do."

"You are my guest," she reminded him, with a catch in her voice that was almost a sob.

"Yes," he responded, huskily, "and you'd have gone hungry to feed a man that just a little while ago was trying to drive you out of the valley."

"Oh, let's forget about that," she pleaded. And now tears glistened on her eyelids, and one bright drop rolled down her cheek.

Jeffrey leaped to his feet. "Here," he said, almost roughly, "I can be something better than a guest who eats you out of house and home. I'm going over to the ranch."

"Oh!" she cried in alarm, "you can't do it. It's just as bad as yesterday. The drifts are deeper."

"No, it isn't so bad, because I can see today,—part of the time, anyway. Do you see that row of cottonwoods over there? No, wait a minute,—there now. Do you see them?"

"Yes, what of them?"

"They'll enable me to keep going in the right direction. I know they're about half a mile to the left of the ranch house. It will be some job plowing through those drifts; but I can make it. Then I'll hitch up two horses, tandem; and bring you over some provisions."

Jessica peered anxiously from the windows toward the line of cottonwoods. For an instant she caught a glimpse of their bare tops against the leaden sky; then they were hidden by a smother of whirling snow. The sky overhead was black with menace. A terrible, knife-like fear stabbed her to the heart. With a cry she turned back to her companion.

"Mr. Steele, don't you see how dangerous it is? Really, I believe it's worse than it was yesterday. Don't try it."

But Jeffrey was already buttoning his fur coat across his throat and pulling down his cap.

"Say good by to me, Jessica," he said, reaching for her hand, "and wish me luck."

"Don't go,——Jeffrey don't go."

He was holding her little, toil-hardened hand in both of his, and she was gazing up into his face. A great sob shook her bosom, and tears rained down her face.

"You'll be lost, I know. Wait! Wait till tomorrow."

"Lost? Suppose I am. You'd just be rid of someone who's scared you half to death."

26-Piece Table Set

Yours Prepaid For A Club Of Seven

WE have in the past made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7397.

STYLISH BEAD NECKLACE

For A Club Of Two

Jade, Coral, Amber, Blue and Red

THE great popularity of these new style necklaces leads us to make this offer to our women and girl readers. In fact, there seems to be a veritable CRAZE for these beautiful, large, odd-shaped beads, which come in different colors to match the costume, and of generous length, so that they hang well down the front of the dress. They are not strung on string or wire but are fastened together with tiny, glittering, silver-colored rings, which form a pleasing contrast with the rich, subdued colors of the beads themselves. Some of these necklaces—which, by the way, retail as high as $5.00—are enormous in size, others are quite small; we picked out a medium size, thinking it would please the greater number of our readers. It is 30 inches long, two of the beads are larger than the rest, as shown in the illustration, while at the very end and serving as a pendant, there hangs a large, handsome, oblong-shaped bead an inch and a quarter long. The smaller beads in this necklace are each five eighths of an inch long and there are forty-two beads in all.

We will send you one of these handsome and stylish necklaces—your choice of red, blue, amber, coral and jade—upon the terms of the following offer.

Given to You. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Necklace free by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 9232.

A Great Frontiersman

"Who was Lewis Wetzel? you ask," remarks Dan Beard, in Boys' Life, the Boy Scout magazine, for November.

"Well he was one of the most picturesque of the old frontiersmen, a striking and unique personality, a real wilderness man, an athlete, supple and powerful, quick and agile as a cat, garbed in fringed buckskin clothes and bearskin hat, with long hair almost reaching to the ground. Like most of the other buckskin knights, he also was captured by the Indians when he was a barefoot boy. Lewis and his brother were playing around the yard of their father's log cabin when he saw a rifle peeking at him from around the corncrib. With the instinct of a wild animal he sprang backwards just as the rifle cracked and the bullet tore a gash clear across his little chest, then the two Indians rushed out and captured the boys. In spite of the pain of the wound, the little fellow kept pace with his captors and never whimpered but stoically trudged along the trail.

"While the Indians slept, Lewis awoke his brother and they took to the tall timber, but the briars and sticks cut their tough little feet so Lewis left his brother, crept back to the Indian camp and took the Indians' moccasins and again started on his way, then he bethought him that they needed arms and once more he turned back, secured the redmen's guns, and made a final break for home where after some startling adventures they safely arrived.

"Wetzel grew up to be a great Indian fighter, and, after his father was slain by a savage, became an Indian hater, believing in that ferocious saying that 'the only good Indian was a dead Indian.' Wetzel hunted Indians thereafter as if they were wolves and not human beings and was very successful in his hunts, seldom returning from the woods without a number of scalps. That in itself was not considered brutal in those days when even authorities used to pay a bounty on Indian scalps just as they do now, in some places, for wolf scalps.

"Wetzel was a great hunter and hunted with Simon Kenton and other great woodmen, but neither Simon Kenton nor Daniel Boone were Indian haters like him."

Five Wheel Chairs in February

543 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

We sent out two wheel chairs more in February than in January, which encourages me to hope that you, my good friends, will so push the good work this month as to enable me to send seven wheel chairs in March for the relief of the unfortunate shut-ins.

The five February chairs go to Miss Rose Thompson, Pickford, Mich., 150; Annie Laura Lewis, R. R. 6, Hartford, Ala., 90; Maud Sparks, Wythevile, Va., 82; Earl Johnson, Raven Rock, W. Va., 81; Mary Audry Chism, R. R. 5, Frankfort, Ky., subscriptions and cash equivalent to 150 subscriptions.

The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or their friends for them, except that the friends of Mary Audry Chism sent subscriptions and cash which together were equivalent to 150 subscriptions for her chair.

Rose Thompson, age 24, is unable to walk because of stiff knee and ankle joints which have become solidified. She has been in this condition since infancy. Nevertheless she is smart and industrious in such lines of work as she can do in her crippled condition.

Annie Laura Lewis, age 7, is paralyzed from her hips down and has been so ever since she had infantile paralysis when a baby. She is a bright, smart little girl, but has never been able to walk. Her COMFORT wheel chair will be a source of great joy to her.

Maud Sparks, age 17, crippled from birth and entirely helpless, cannot even dress herself or comb her hair. Her wheel chair will be a comfort to her and a help to those who have the care of her.

Earl Johnson, age 21, has been crippled from birth by spinal trouble and is entirely helpless except that he has some use of his right hand.

Mary Audry Chism, age 7, had infantile paralysis when eight months old and it has left her paralyzed in both legs; she can not even sit up without support.

You will be interested in the following picture of Mrs. S. E. Whittington and letter which accompanies it, also in our Roll of Honor.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

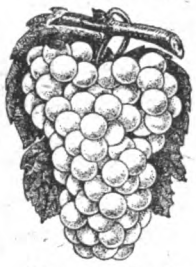
Plant This Grand Fruit Orchard

Delaware Grape

Bartlett Pear



Concord Grape

Wealthy Apple

Rex Raspberry

Niagara Grape

—For A Club Of Two—

We Will Send You Seventeen Apple And Pear Trees, Berry Bushes and Grape Vines!

BY special arrangement with the growers in Michigan we can now offer our readers this grand Fruit and Orchard Collection of 17 Choice Fruit Trees, Berry Bushes and Grape Vines. If planted at standard distances apart they will nicely fill an eighth of an acre. Or they can be planted closer if desired, or they can be made to form a border around your yard or lot. Wherever grown, however, they will yield loads of the finest Apples, Pears, Grapes, Raspberries and Dewberries every year as long as you live. All the varieties in this splendid Collection have been carefully selected for their characteristics of rapid growth, early maturity, immense yield and extreme hardiness. We believe it would be difficult to secure as much actual value from any other assortment of the same size.

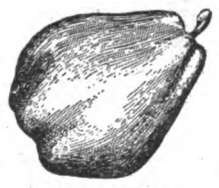
Here is what we give you:

One Snow Apple Tree, One Wealthy Apple Tree, One Kieffer Pear Tree, One Bartlett Pear Tree, Two Lucretia Dewberry Bushes, Two Rex Raspberry Bushes, Three Niagara Grape Vines, Three Delaware Grape Vines, Three Concord Grape Vines.

The four grafted Apple and Pear Trees in this Collection are the best that can be procured. They are one foot high, grafted by experts from bearing trees with high records. They will take root as soon as planted and grow rapidly into vigorous healthy trees. You could not get better trees at any price.

The nine Grape Vines are a product of southern Michigan, where the finest grapes in the world are grown. From selected vines, cuttings are taken and buried in underground pits until they undergo a process known as "callousing." After being properly "calloused" the cuttings will take root as soon as planted. The "calloused" Grape Cuttings in this Collection are all produced in this manner. They will grow rapidly and bear immense crops of choice grapes even sooner than large vines planted at the same time.

The two Raspberry Bushes and two Dewberry Bushes in this Collection are robust, one-year-old youngsters, ready to set out as soon as you receive them. They will begin growing at once and develop into fine, heavy-bearing bushes if given proper attention.



All Will Bear Soon! The garden which you plant with this fine Fruit and Orchard Collection will prove an ever increasing source of pleasure and profit to you year after year. All the trees, vines and bushes will bear fruit in a remarkably short time. The Raspberry will produce some fruit this season. Then next year your Dewberries will commence bearing. The following year you will have grapes and some pears. (A properly cared-for Grape Vine will yield a bushel of grapes every season.) Your Apple and Pear Trees will begin bearing in from three to five years. Then you will have loads and loads of fine fruit in increasing quantity every year.

Guaranteed To Grow! Everything in this Collection is absolutely guaranteed to grow. We stand behind every Collection sent out and the growers in turn stand behind us. You may rest assured that if you order this splendid Collection (and you surely ought to), it will reach you in good condition and grow to your entire satisfaction if the directions for planting are carefully followed. If any of the trees, bushes or vines fail to make growth satisfactory to you, we hereby guarantee to replace them promptly and absolutely without charge to you. You cannot lose. You run absolutely no risk in accepting this offer.

Full Planting Instructions! With this fine Fruit and Orchard Collection we are also going to send you complete instructions for planting. These directions are fully illustrated with pictures and diagrams showing you just what to do and when and how to do it. By following these simple directions you will in a few years have one of the finest orchards in your neighborhood.

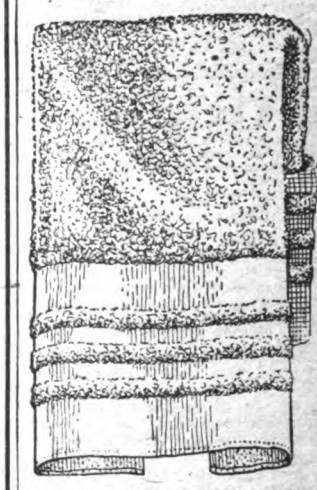
See The Wonders Of War Through The Pan-Chro Scope



THE war is over—our boys are coming home—but the tragic scenes of conflict, the desolate ruins of villages and towns, and the thousands upon thousands of miles of devastated country where the tide of battle ebbed and flowed for so many years will live in the memory of every living person of this generation and the next.

Few of us will ever travel to Europe and there, with our own eyes view the actual scenes of the mightiest conflict in history. But you can see them through the Pan-Chro Scope, which is almost as good. The Pan-Chro Scope is a new invention—something like the stereoscope—fitted with twin-stereo lens of wonderful magnifying power. With this Scope we send you 96 different War Views, taken with the Camera. You place the View in the Scope, and immediately you find yourself face to face with an astonishingly life-like scene that resembles a section of a moving-picture film. First you are aboard an American warship—next you are looking into a trench "somewhere in France," then you are among the barbed wire entanglements in "No Man's Land," again you are watching house-to-house fighting in a captured French town, and many other scenes of actual warfare just as interesting and exciting—96 of them in all. The different views take you direct to Belgium, France or wherever the place may be and show you the scenes almost as plainly as though you were there yourself. This Pan-Chro Scope and Views is one of the most wonderful souvenirs of the great war yet produced. Everybody is fascinated with it—men, women, boys and girls alike. We have but a few left—but you can feel sure of getting one if your order is mailed at once.

To Trappers!

Write us describing your most interesting experiences, trapping secrets, etc.! Send us a good "trapping" picture! For the best letters and photographs received we will pay Two Hundred Dollars in Prizes!

How To Write The Letter!

MAKE your letter as short as possible but do not leave out anything important for the sake of shortness.

Write in your own style, how many traps you used this season, how many and what kind of furs you took and how much cold cash you got for them.

Also describe any interesting and exciting experiences that you may have had and tell us about any trapping secrets you may know. Especially are we interested in the methods or "secrets" used by the most skillful trappers. If you follow any successful methods of your own in the matter of baits, setting your traps, skinning, etc., or if other trappers have told you about the methods which they use, be sure to describe them. In short, try to make your letter just as interesting and just as helpful to other trappers as you possibly can, for that is the kind of a letter that will win a prize.

How To Take The Picture!

WE want a good photograph of your furs —all of them if possible, or at least as many as you have on hand at any one time. You can tack them up on the side of the barn or show them in a pile.

Also, we would like a photograph of some interesting trapping scene—something perhaps that has happened along your trap line.

But be sure to send us a picture of your furs anyway. If you send them to market in several different shipments, take a picture of each shipment before it goes.

If you haven't a camera, get some friend who owns one to take the pictures for you. Please remember that the photograph should not be smaller than 2¼ by 3¼ inches. The postcard size—3¼ by 5½—is the best size you could send.

How Lack of Iron In the Blood May Change A Woman's Appearance And Break Down Her Physical Strength

While Plenty of Iron Makes Rich Red Blood Corpuscles That Give Health, Vitality and Beauty

Every Woman Who Looks Pale, Haggard and Worn Should Have Her Blood Examined For Iron Deficiency—Administration of Simple Nuxated Iron Will Often Increase The Strength and Endurance of Weak, Nervous, Care Worn Women In Two Weeks' Time and Make Them Look Years Younger.

These illustrations show how a woman may look when she has only 25% red blood corpuscles and her blood is starving for iron and the change that takes place in her appearance when the percentage of red corpuscles increase as her blood becomes filled with strength-giving iron.

Longing for the keen activity, the youthful step, the fresh rosy cheeks and the sunny disposition of buoyant health is making many a woman unhappy, discontented, wrinkled and old before her time. Sleepless nights spent worrying over supposed ailments, constant dosing with habit-forming drugs and narcotics and useless attempts to brace up with strong coffee do not help the real cause of their trouble, which may be nothing more than lack of iron in the blood. For want of iron a woman may look and feel old at thirty, pale, haggard, and all run down—while at 50 or 60 with good health and plenty of iron in the blood she may still be young in feeling, and so full of life and attractiveness as to defy detection of her real age.

That women may become stronger, healthier, more beautiful and better able to meet the cares of home, social and business life by increasing the supply of iron in their blood is the opinion of Dr. George H. Baker, formerly Physician and Surgeon of Monmouth Memorial Hospital, New Jersey, who says: "What women need to put roses in their cheeks and the springtime of life into their step is not cosmetics or stimulating drugs, but plenty of rich, pure red blood. Without it no woman can do credit to herself or to her work. Iron is one of the greatest of all strength and blood-builders, and I have found nothing in my experience so effective for helping to make strong, healthy, red-blooded women as Nuxated Iron. From a careful examination of the formula and my own tests of Nuxated Iron, I feel convinced that it is a preparation which any physician can take himself or prescribe for his patients with the utmost confidence of obtaining highly beneficial and satisfactory results."

Among other physicians asked for an opinion was Dr. Ferdinand King, New York Physician and Medical Author. Dr. King says: "By enriching the blood and increasing its oxygen carrying power Nuxated Iron will often transform the flabby flesh, toneless tissues, and pallid cheeks of nervous, rundown women into a glow of health and make them look years younger within a surprisingly short time."

Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly Physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital, says: "As I have said a hundred times over, organic iron is one of the greatest of all strength builders. I have prescribed Nuxated Iron—organic iron—many, many times, and I have seen frequent instances where it gave renewed strength and energy, increased power and endurance, steady nerves, and the rosy bloom of health in about ten days' or two weeks' time. I consider Nuxated Iron one of the foremost blood and body builders—the best to which I have ever had recourse.

It is surprising how many people suffer from iron deficiency and do not know it. If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see how much you have gained.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE. Nuxated Iron, which is prescribed and recommended above by physicians is not a secret remedy but one which is well known to druggists. Unlike the older inorganic iron products it is easily assimilated and does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed in this city by all good druggists.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

rest assured I mean to get all the good out of life I possibly can.

I have been reading COMFORT since 1891. I have several personal letters from Aunt Minerva. I suppose I had better introduce myself. I am five feet, one inch tall, have light hair, blue-grey eyes, fair complexion, in winter, "dark" in summer. Weigh—well, I guess I had not better tell you this time. And I am old enough to suit every sister who reads COMFORT? My disposition? Terrible! I could not worry if I tried. I feel that—

"There are just as many wedding dresses,
As there are o' shrouds.
And we find the sun a-shinin'
Just behind the clouds.
Life is sweet and joy is free,
And God is mighty good to me."

I would be glad to hear from any of the sisters. Will answer all letters but remember if you do not like long letters don't write to me. One of the readers, at least, can tell you she has received as many as thirty-five pages in one letter from me, so beware! If I could write like Pearl Vesey I would write into the wee sma' hours every night. As it is, my pen is worse than an eight-day clock when I get behind it.

I am sending in a little poem and if the editor thinks it worth while, please print it.

I am married and have one little girl, twelve years old. MRS. ANNIE B. BLANTON.

Be Careful What You Say

"In speaking of a person's faults,
Pray don't forget your own;
Remember those of homes of glass
Should never throw a stone.
If we had nothing else to do
Than to talk of those who sin,
'Tis better we commence at home,
And from that point begin.

"We have no right to judge a man
Until he is fairly tried;
Should we not like his company,
We know the world is wide.
Some may have faults——
And who has not?
The old as well as young;
Perhaps we may, for aught we know,
Have fifty to their one.

"Then let us all, when we begin
To slander friend or foe,
Think of the harm one word may do
To those we little know.
Remember, curses sometimes, like
Our chickens roost at home.
Don't speak of others' faults
Until you have none of your own."

—Anon.

Suppose

Suppose, my little lady,
Your doll should break her head,
Could you make it whole by crying
Till your eyes and nose were red?
And wouldn't it be pleasanter
To treat it as a joke?
And say you're glad 'twas dolly's
And not your head that broke?

Suppose you're dressed for walking,
And the rain comes pouring down,
Will it clear off any sooner
Because you scold and frown?
And wouldn't it be nicer
For you to smile than pout,
And so make sunshine in the house
When there is none without?

Suppose your task, my little man,
Is very hard to get,
Will it make it any easier
For you to sit and fret?
And wouldn't it be nicer
Than waiting like a dunce,
To get to work in earnest,
And learn the thing at once?

Suppose that some boys have a horse,
And some a coach and pair,
Will it tire you less while walking
To say, "It isn't fair"?
And wouldn't it be nobler
To keep your temper sweet,
And in your heart be thankful
You can walk upon your feet?

Suppose the world don't please you,
Nor the way some people do,
Do you think the whole creation
Will be altered just for you?
And isn't it, my boy or girl,
The wisest, bravest plan
Whatever comes, or doesn't come,
To do the best you can?

—Phœbe Cary.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

When ironing stand on an old cushion.

Strawberries, well sweetened and dried while fresh, are fine fruits for fruit cake.

When drying corn or pumpkins, grease the plates used and the vegetable will not stick.

Fasten a window shade to a set of open shelves and see how nicely it keeps out the dust.

Rub a large cork on the scouring cake and then on your knives and it makes the cleaning easier.

A good kitchen apron is made of white oilcloth, bound with dark braid.—LOUISE, Portland, Maine.

Wipe all greasy dishes with paper and burn paper. This saves getting the sink pipe clogged with grease.

A weak solution of ammonia, denatured alcohol and gasolene, used before washing article, will remove oleomargerine capsule coloring from clothing.

To remove grease spot from floor, rub with French chalk, place a piece of blotting paper over the spot and set a hot iron on the paper. Leave until cool.—HENRY'S WIFE, Fla.

TO REMOVE PAPER FROM POLISHED SURFACE OF DINING TABLE.—(Requested.) Drop sweet oil on the paper and rub gently with a cloth.—MRS. J. C. BEATTY, Greensburg, Box 473, Kans.

Put hard, dry lemons in hot water for two hours. Keep at an even temperature. This makes them like fresh ones. Or a large quantity of juice may be obtained from a stale lemon by heating it thoroughly in oven for a few minutes.

CHINA BERRY BEADS.—Boil the berries until easily pierced with a needle and the yellow skin will come off when rubbed. String them while still hot, using coarse thread for the purpose. Let them dry in a warm place, moving on the string every few hours to keep the holes from drying too small.

I was often bothered by having garments made with body and sleeve in one piece tearing from just under the arm across each way until I tried this plan: Take a straight strip of cloth, I use a lengthwise piece, long enough to reach from the bottom of the article to the edge of sleeve. Sew between the edges. It helps relieve the strain.

When crocheting or embroidering and the finger gets sore, stick a piece of surgeon's plaster over it.—MRS. ELLAN M. HARRINGTON, So. Fayston, Va.

When frying fish if you'll let your fat come to the boiling point and put a small amount of salt in it, the fat won't "pop" and it keeps the fish from burning.

When sweeping, wet your broom in hot salty water and note results.

In beating eggs, first add a few drops of water. It makes them much lighter.—MRS. Y. G. BOLT, Westminster, S. C.

To chop suet, cut in small pieces and remove the membrane. Sprinkle with flour and chop in a cold place to prevent sticking.

Moulds should be greased for any steamed mixture, wet in cold water for jellies, creams, etc., and neither greased nor wet if to be lined with cake.

To keep polished furniture free from spots, rub with a piece of soft silk saturated with vaseline.

Requests

How to care for orange trees from seeds. Trees are kept in house during winter.

Wanted: One copy each of the September and October, 1918, issues of the American Review of Reviews. Will remunerate. Write me before mailing copies. E. F. COLWELL, Mt. Auburn, Ill.

If any of the boys who served in France with Private Leo Brinda in Co. E, 4th Inf., know anything of his death or where he is buried and would be kind enough to write to his mother it would be greatly appreciated.—MRS. CHAS. BRINDA, Valentine, Box 337, Nebr.

Would like the following songs sent me: "For Death Is Only a Dream," and "Boys in Blue." Also want a sure-enough cucumber pickle recipe so the cucumbers will be crisp and green like the ones we buy.—IDA MYERS, George West, Texas.

Remedies

BURNS.—Apply kerosene.

For a tickling in the throat, try a pinch of salt as far back in the mouth as possible.—MRS. ELLEN M. HARRINGTON, So. Fayston, Vt.

Granulated sugar is good to stop bleeding from a wound. Bind on dry and it will soon stop the bleeding and remove soreness. Leave on for twelve hours.

FITS.—Eat a piece of swamp cabbage root the size of a pea one hour before breakfast. Keep this up until cured. Sometimes it requires six months.

CROUP.—One teaspoonful alum mixed with white of an egg and give in teaspoonful doses every few minutes, until vomiting is produced.—CONTENT, Pennsylvania.

RHEUMATISM.—Take the dry bark and roots of black snakeroot, one ounce, and pour over it one pint of hot water. Let stand 48 hours and it is then ready for use. One tablespoonful one hour after meals, three times daily.

GALL STONES.—Take ten teaspoons of ground root of sweetweed and one half teaspoon of sacred bark. Boil in one pint of water for one hour or until the liquid becomes slippery. Strain and cool. Comfort's League of Cousins a third of our male population were diseased, undernourished and unfit to fight. They had had plenty of food, but it was the wrong food and badly cooked. The fiendish frying pan, so dear to the heart of the average housewife, had practically murdered these rejected men. We have millions of stenographers (so called) but the money that is needed for their stomachs they put on their backs, or spend at the paint shops. When women are painted like Indians and wear only enough clothes to make a wristlet for a humming bird, don't talk about decency in an office or anywhere else. Mearle, a first-class cook can make ten thousand dollars a year, and that is more than a stenographer ever made, unless she vamped or married the boss. So be a cook.

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.

Mrs. D. D. Handy, Shuff, Va. Has lung trouble. Unable to do anything. Sad and worthy case. Who will help her? Mrs. Mollie Burriss, Price, N. C. Invalid for thirteen years. Needy and worthy. Twenty years of age. Unable to speak and helpless as a baby. Father has tuberculosis. His mother cares for him the best she can, but in these days of high prices it is hard even to provide him with the necessaries of life. Who will give this family a boost? G. Lee Roberson, Elamsville, Box 22, Va. Invalid. Unable to work. Send him some cheer. Mrs. Elizabeth Vanhouse, Tomahawk, Ky. Widow, eighty-one years of age. Sick, poor and alone. Send her some of the sympathy that buys bread. Mrs. Martha A. Bell, Springfield, 930 Garfield Ave., Ill. Invalid, sixty-six years of age. Widow, no means of support. Do not forget her. W. J. Bennett, Jr., Northville, N. Y. Invalid for eighteen years. Well recommended. Unable to work. Give him a boost. Mrs. Minnie L. Williams, Shuff, Va. Great sufferer from rheumatism. Has three boys, eight, six and three years of age, respectively. Would appreciate second-hand clothing for herself and children and any financial assistance you care to send her. Edward L. Potts, Owassa, Ala. Crippled for many years. Would appreciate letters, especially from cripples.

Here's your chance to do some real good. Suffering, without money for proper nourishment, medical advice, expert nursing and necessary drugs, is hell. I know for I have been there. Give liberally and save these poor souls worry and torture.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

With Shutter and Lens

By Carl Schurz Lowden

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THEODORE Roosevelt, who humbled the most savage beasts of Africa, came back to his home at Oyster Bay with a decided preference for hunting in his own front yard and the neighborhood. He would rather stalk Long Island's songbirds with a camera or opera glass than slay the biggest rhino in all the length and breadth of the Dark Continent.

Camera hunting is like any other game. If you enter into it enthusiastically, you will experience a mental and physical boost, a lifting-up to a new horizon, a discovery of a new world. If you master a few necessary principles, you and your friends will reap real enjoyment.

The mere possession of a camera opens up many possibilities. When the men make hay and wee Johnny hitches the goat to his little wagon to haul a load all by himself, take aim and press the shutter release. Do thou likewise with a baby brother or sister, a pony, a dog or any other pet. When you participate in a picnic or any worth-while activity, record the event with a big dinner or a reunion or a club meeting or your picture-taking device.

Now a box camera will produce passable photos and views, but, obviously, cannot compare with the high-priced type. Its cost is small and it represents good value. It has a fixed or universal focus. It can be used successfully, with a few exceptions, only on days when the sun shines. This feature somewhat sadly limits the range of subjects. The ordinary box camera is operated by means of a lever and therefore is not a safe proposition when prevailing clouds necessitate a time exposure.

A folding camera, as the name implies, is much more flexible than the box style. It has a focusing scale; if the subject is ten feet from the operation, the front must be set at that mark. The distance must be correctly estimated or the resulting photo will be blurred.

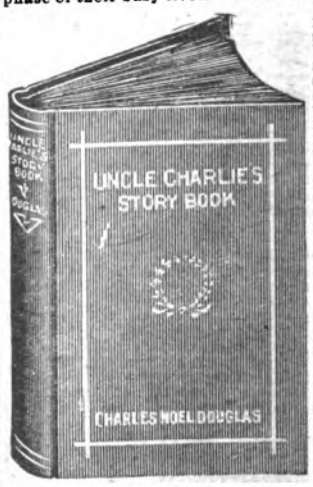
Exposures of varying lengths can be made with the folding type, whereas the box camera is restricted to the instantaneous or snapshot and another technically called "Time." The folding mechanism may have as many as five kinds of snapshots, from one fifth of a second to one three hundredth or even faster. It also has "Bulb" and "Time," permitting any length of exposure that may be desired.

There are two kinds of cameras, one using rolls or sheets of films and the other using dry plates of glass. The latter are bulky and add much weight to the carrying case; therefore, the film type is preferable. If a picture is taken on a flat sheet of film or on a plate, it can be removed and developed at once. With the roll film the operator cannot develop any image until all the exposures, six, ten or twelve, have been made. Absolute accuracy in focusing and placing or centering is possible with the plate camera for the picture is thrown upon the ground glass; it is precisely the same as the finished product with the exception that it appears upside down.

There are two classes of photos, those of inanimate objects and those of living forms capable of movement. For the first, it is advisable to make a slow exposure with the diaphragm, which admits the light, partly closed; this adjustment brings the details out sharp. A rapid exposure is needed for any moving object and the diaphragm should be wide open or nearly so. In taking a landscape with trees swaying gently and sun shining, one twenty-fifth of a second would be safe whereas in a strong wind the speed should be doubled or quadrupled. In snapping an animal one must be scrupulously careful to click the shutter when the animal is momentarily still.

A photo may be taken indoors or out, in the shade or in the sun's glaring rays. Rarely should a snapshot be attempted when clouds obscure the sun. Indoor work requires four to thirty seconds, depending upon the amount of light available and the diaphragm opening employed. In taking pictures under a tree or in the shade of a house, an exposure of one second or half that time will produce good results if the amount of light is properly restricted.

Do your own developing and make your own prints for thereby you will cut the cost and will, when you have caught the knack, obtain better pictures. Films can be developed automatically in a tank. For plates, a dark room and red or yellow light are imperative. Many camera users have the films or plates developed and prints made by drug stores which maintain photo-finishing departments.



The two best sizes for ordinary purposes are four by five inches and the post-card dimension. With the large sizes, the operating cost mounts.

There is much to learn. Photography cultivates the faculty of observation, quickens the mental outlook, adds a new interest to existence and dispels melancholy or "blues." Like any other hobby, it affords diversion and makes a person more capable, but, like any other hobby, it must be ridden moderately.

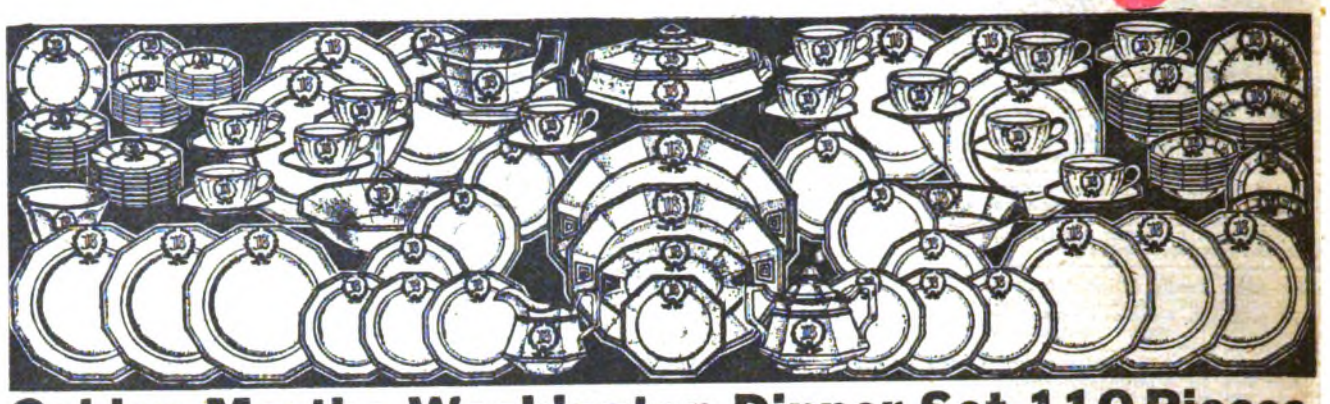
Had Him Guessing

A noted physician was a guest at a social affair. At the dinner he was placed beside an elderly woman whom he had not previously met. Almost at once she began to talk.

"By the way, doctor," she smilingly remarked, "I am undecided whether I should call you 'doctor' or 'professor.'"



"You may call me what you wish, madam," replied the physician. "I am frank enough to admit, however, that some of my friends call me an old fossil."

"I see, doctor," was the rather startling response of the woman, "but, of course, they must be people who know you intimately."—Boston Herald.

COMFORT EDITORIAL

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Don't Miss the First Opportunity to Procure an Ample Stock of Sugar for the Canning Season

OUR readers will remember that in our January editorial we predicted that, because of President Wilson's action last summer and fall in not permitting the U. S. Sugar Equalization Board to buy the Cuban sugar crop, our people would have to pay fifty to seventy-five per cent. more for sugar in 1920 than in 1919 and suffer the inconvenience of a sugar shortage. Thus far our prediction has been more than verified. Not only has sugar been distressingly scarce and dear, but in the Eastern States, at least, a considerable portion of such as was obtainable has been of inferior quality, so that we have paid all sorts of high prices for sugar, good, bad and indifferent, and lucky to get any at that. At times we have had to pay twenty-three cents a pound for sticky, yellow Louisiana sugar or for the coarse, Brazilian product or—go without. Sometimes there was none of any kind to be had.

If sugar, the white granulated American-refined Cuban sugar such as heretofore has been the standard of quality in our market, is to be plentiful at any time this year it is most likely to happen during the spring, as that is the season in which the output of Cuba usually reaches its maximum. Therefore, viewing the present prospect in the light of the past three years' experience of sugar shortage, we advise COMFORT readers to avail themselves of the first opportunity to procure and lay by an abundant store of sugar for canning purposes. Buy when it can be had, and make sure of it even if the price is high, as it is bound to be for reasons which we shall explain. Should sugar, as we hope, happen to be plentiful for a while this spring many will argue that it will soon be cheaper and advise you to wait for the price to drop. Of course the price may drop, though present indications all point to the contrary; and it may go higher. But the important point is the likelihood of a sugar shortage at canning time, so that by waiting you may not be able to obtain any.

In the early summer of 1917 and again in the spring of 1918 the Government promised the housewives a sufficient supply of sugar for canning purposes, but it failed to materialize in either year. Last spring sugar was plentiful and could be bought in any quantity desired for any and all purposes except for export; at that time the Government issued a bulletin urging housewives and wholesale and retail dealers to stock up in anticipation of the needs of the canning season, and explaining that exports, soon to begin, would reduce the surplus stock during the summer. Some were wise enough to act on this advice, but the great majority let it pass unheeded, due in part to the circulation of a false rumor that an effort was being made to unload sugar on the public before a drop in price. The result was that by the time the canning season opened sugar had become very scarce and so it has been ever since. Experience in this case, as usual, has been a hard teacher, but by this time the people should have learned the lesson that, under present conditions, the prudent course is to stock up with sugar whenever it is to be had.

In the summer of 1918 the U. S. Sugar Equalization Board bought up the entire Cuban raw sugar crop at five and a half cents a pound and thereby was enabled to maintain a retail price of ten or eleven cents for refined sugar throughout 1919. Last summer Cuba offered its 1919 crop of raw sugar to our Government at six and a half cents a pound and the Sugar Equalization Board urged President Wilson to authorize its purchase at that price, as the power to do so had been conferred on him by Congress. This offer remained open from July until September 22 without being acted on by Mr. Wilson. Cuba got tired of waiting and, finding she could do better elsewhere, withdrew her offer on the latter date. Europe immediately stepped in as a bidder and secured a part of the Cuban crop; and since then the Cuban producers have been selling at from eight and a half to twelve cents their new-crop raw sugar, which we might have had at six and a half cents a pound.

Before the Cuban raw reaches the American consumer in the form of refined granulated various elements of cost, such as transportation from Cuba, refining in the United States and distribution, manufacturers', wholesalers' and retailers' profits, have to be added to the Cuban price. But as the price at which Cuba offered her new-crop sugar last summer was only a cent a pound higher than we paid her the year before it seems reasonably clear that if Mr. Wilson had accepted the offer we should now be getting our sugar at the grocer's for about a cent a pound more than we paid last year, and plenty of it at that.

Temperance Cause Is Suffering from Fanatical Leadership

NATION-WIDE prohibition of the liquor traffic has proved such an inestimable blessing during the short time it has been in force, promises so much for the future welfare of our country, and such a long and hard struggle had to be waged for its adoption, that the utmost care should have been taken by its advocates and supporters to make such reasonable and proper use of the victory as not to weaken, but rather strengthen, public sentiment in favor of the cause. Nevertheless, since the adoption of the prohibitory amendment of the U. S. Constitution the attitude, demands and conduct of the leaders of the movement have been so injudicious, unreasonable and oppressive that they have caused, thus early, a wide-spread revulsion of public opinion and have furnished the liquor interests with ammunition for the troublesome and perhaps dangerous assault now being launched against the enforcement of our national prohibitory law.

Suppression of the evils of intemperance is the only justifiable purpose of a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and any such law that is designed to go beyond the accomplishment of this legitimate purpose is, to that extent, an oppressive invasion of natural rights and personal liberty that is sure to arouse public indignation and augment the forces arrayed in favor of the liquor interests. COMFORT is and always has been an aggressive advocate of nation-wide prohibition as the most effective means of promoting temperance. Therefore we regret that Congress in legislating for the enforcement of the national prohibitory amendment yielded to the demands of fanatics and imposed on the country a law that oversteps the purposes of temperance, needlessly and oppressively infringes natural rights and personal liberty, and in these objectionable respects is believed to be unconstitutional.

Bear in mind this fundamentally important distinction between the legislative powers of Congress and those of the States. The legislative powers of a State are general and unlimited except so far as restricted by its own Constitution or by the Constitution of the United States; but Congress has such law-making powers only as are conferred by the U. S. Constitution expressly or by necessary implication, so that any act of Congress that exceeds the authority granted by the Constitution is null and void to the extent of such excess. The only power that Congress has to prohibit the liquor traffic in the States in time of peace (its war powers are almost unlimited) is derived from the prohibitory amendment of the Federal Constitution adopted in January, 1919, which reads as follows:

"Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"Section 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Please note that the prohibitory clause applies only to intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and observe that the legislative power conferred on Congress extends no further than enforcement, which latter means the prescribing of penalties and other suitable measures for preventing violations of the amendment. The Constitution itself, as amended, specifies and defines precisely what is prohibited (intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes) and does not authorize Congress to extend or otherwise alter the range or subject matter of the prohibition. Despite this limitation Congress has gone far beyond the Constitution, notably by prohibiting the making or sale of any and all beverages containing more than one-half of one per cent. of alcohol regardless of whether they are or are not in fact intoxicating. Congress has no power to specify the percentage of alcohol that a beverage may lawfully contain, for the Constitution prohibits only intoxicating liquors and this makes it a question of fact for the court or jury in each case to decide whether or not the particular beverage under investigation is, according to the evidence, actually intoxicating. The judge of the United States Court in Wisconsin so decided on March first in a case involving the legality of the manufacture and sale of two and one-half per cent. beer. He decided as a matter of fact that a beverage containing, as this beer did, only two and one-half per cent. of alcohol is not intoxicating, and that, as a matter of law, the one-half of one per cent. limit fixed by Congress is unconstitutional and void. There is nothing new or startling about this decision as it is based on well-established principles of law frequently enunciated by many other American courts.

By fixing the maximum alcoholic content allowable at one-half of one per cent. Congress and the fanatics who instigated the folly have wrongfully prohibited a large number of harmless, non-intoxicating drinks heretofore in common use and many of them home-made. New cider, grape juice, many other fruit and berry juices and the home-brewed root and ginger beers that so delight the children in summer—all these will in a few hours, by the natural process of fermentation, generate more than one-half of one per cent. of alcohol, and thereby come under the ban, not of the prohibitory amendment, but of the unconstitutional act of Congress. How is the housewife to know when the new cider, grape juice or home-brewed beer has generated an alcoholic content of one-half of one per cent. which is indistinguishable to taste or smell, imperceptible in its effect, and detectable only by a careful chemical analysis?

No wonder the people resent such senseless, useless, purposeless deprivation of their natural rights and personal liberty. But its most unfortunate result is the effect it is having in turning public sentiment against nation-wide prohibition.

As Maine has lived under a prohibitory law for more than sixty years we cite the legislative and judicial policy of our State in dealing with this issue, feeling that it should carry some weight. Our State law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors never specified the percentage of alcohol that should render a beverage unlawful, but the Maine courts long ago decided, on the testimony of experts, that as a matter of fact beverages containing less than three per cent. of alcohol were not intoxicating. The courts of Massachusetts and, as I understand, of some other States having prohibitory or local option laws adopted the same standard, which was so generally recognized that a Massachusetts brewery did a large business in manufacturing a two and three-quarters per cent. beer which sold in Maine and in the no-license towns of Massachusetts under the sanction of the courts as non-

His Heart's Queen

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

He pocketed the document as he concluded, and then abruptly left the room.

"I will read it" she at last said, resolutely.

At last, by a dextrous movement she turned the key completely around.

She stood up again, gave a light, swift spring and was safely over.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

On a car, going up a steep hill, leading to the Zoological Gardens of Cincinnati, is Violet Draper Huntington. Opposite her sits Wallace Richardson. Nearly at the top of the hill, something beneath the car breaks. Wallace seizes Violet's hands and locking them behind his neck commands her to cling. The car crashes down, burying all the passengers beneath the ruins. They are the only two alive and hurried to Wallace Richardson's home, are cared for by his mother, Mrs. Mencke, Violet's sister provides a nurse and leaves orders for Violet to see no one. The nurse out for a walk, Violet goes to the adjoining room to meet Wallace and thank him for the life saved. As they become more friendly, Wallace realizes his danger and Violet is hopelessly in love. Violet asks Wallace to come with his mother to see her. Mrs. Mencke takes Violet to Saratoga for two months, then to Cincinnati, and home. The following day, picking up a paper, Violet reads of Mrs. Richardson's death. She goes to the Richardsons' house and expresses her sympathy to Wallace, who unconsciously calls her my darling, and asks her forgiveness. As she whispers, "I am glad," he knows she is all his own. Returning home, her sister demands where she has been, and learning it was at Mrs. Richardson's funeral, that she rides in the carriage with Wallace and Mrs. Dent, Mrs. Mencke denounces it as questionable and that she must drop him for all time. Wallace, calling upon Violet, Mr. and Mrs. Mencke return and she introduces him and admits he is her promised husband. She overhears Belle's and her husband's scheme to place her in a convent. Mrs. Mencke, proposing a trip to Montreal, Violet refuses to go, and Mrs. Mencke takes Mrs. Hawley, who is to sail for Europe and chaperone Nellie Bailey, into her confidence and requests her to induce Violet to join them. Violet makes ready for the proposed trip and Wallace is at the steamer to say good by. Vane Cameron and Ralph Henderson join Mr. and Mrs. Hawley's party and before the voyage is over Vane Cameron surrenders his heart to Violet. Mrs. Mencke schemes that no letters pass between Violet and Wallace and later, joining the party in Europe, gives her permission for Vane to win Violet. Failing to get Violet's consent, she produces a notice of Wallace Richardson's death, which throws Violet into a severe sickness, leaving her sad and heartbroken. She confesses to Vane her love for Wallace Richardson, her sister's opposition, concealing nothing. Knowing she is unhappy from causes other than Wallace's death, Vane urges her to allow him to give her his name, to shield her from sorrow and care. Violet, afraid to yield, hesitates, but later she consents to what he thinks best, but with many misgivings. Mrs. Mencke, entering Violet's room, finds the bed made and the room in order and no trace discovered of her. Four weeks later, Lord Cameron sees the body of a woman upon the beach clad in dark grey suit with bands of blue silk. Believing it is Violet, he selects a spot near the sea for burial. The next day a stranger appears and requests to meet the woman reported to have married Lord Cameron. Being questioned by the Menckes his right, he produces the marriage certificate and Vane Cameron confirms it by Violet's admission of it to him, the treatment received, her disappearance and later the finding of her body by drowning and the burial. Wallace falls unconscious and Lady Cameron and Vane remain with Wallace through a severe illness, after which he returns to New York, building up a fine business. In the meanwhile, Wilhelm Mencke squanders all at the gaming table and Mrs. Mencke goes to Cincinnati from which place she suddenly disappears. Violet comes to New York, securing a position as governess for Bertha Lawrence, who is partially blind and possessed of a strong will. She wins her affections, Mr. Lawrence treating her as a member of the family, and alone with himself determines to win Violet. Wilhelm Mencke secures Violet's address and learns that Wallace Richardson is in the city. Calling upon him and desiring to raise money, he offers Violet's jewelry for two thousand dollars. Wallace objects. As the husband of Violet, he is the legal heir and will give a sum which may be named as their value and fifty dollars. Jonas Huntington dies, leaving a fortune to his niece, Violet Huntington. She, supposed to be dead, the nearest heir is Mrs. Wilhelm Mencke, for whom search is being made. Wilhelm Mencke, to secure this property, schemes to get Violet in his power. He haunts Fifth Avenue and learns of her movements. Bertha Lawrence, meeting with an accident, is lovingly cared for by Violet, until her death, after which she proposes to look for employment. Mr. Lawrence, in his gratitude, desires to adopt her as his daughter and heiress. Violet, going out at dusk, is accosted by Mencke. She steps around the corner of a street, when she is suddenly seized and thrust into a carriage, and carried to a scantily furnished apartment where she is waited upon by a woman who is sworn to guard her. Lord Cameron, still in the city, receives many invitations, and secures favors for Wallace. The first they attend, Lord Cameron meets and is charmed with Alice Humphrey who later promises to be his wife.

CHAPTER XXX.

VIOLET MAKES AN IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

A WEEK went by after Violet's capture and Mr. Lawrence, although he made every effort night and day, had not been able to learn anything regarding her mysterious disappearance, neither had the young girl herself succeeded in finding any loophole by which she might hope to effect her escape from the custody of her brother-in-law.

She had, however, managed, by her unvarying courtesy and kindness, to win the good-will and sympathy of the woman who waited upon her, although she could not persuade her—notwithstanding she tried every inducement that she could think of—to give her an opportunity to get out of her prison.

"I can't let you go, miss," she said, when Violet pleaded with her and tried to explain that she was abetting a great wrong by keeping her thus confined. "I've taken my oath that I would guard you faithfully as long as your brother kept you here, and I can't go back on my word. He said you'd try to wheedle me and tell me all sorts of stories about him, but that was to make no difference; and then I can't afford to lose the pay he gives me."

"What does he pay you?" Violet demanded, eagerly, and thinking that perhaps she might be able to outbid Mr. Mencke.

"I promised I wouldn't tell you that either, miss," Sarah responded: "but it is to be more'n I ever earned in my life before, if I stick to my engagement: if I don't, and you get away from me, I'm not to have anything."

"I do not care how much he has promised you," Violet said, driven to desperation. "I will give you my note—a written agreement—for a hundred dollars more than he is to give you."

The woman flushed, and seemed to be considering the advisability of taking the tempting bait.

Violet gathered courage from her apparent hesitation.

"My friends must be very anxious about me," she continued, "and I am very sure that the gentleman with whom I have been living—I have been a governess in his family—would also give you something handsome. Besides, it is a crime for you to aid Mr. Mencke in keeping me here against my will."

"But he says he has a right to govern you—that he is your guardian," Sarah returned thoughtfully.

"He is not; he, with my sister, was made the guardian of some property which my father left, me, and which I was not to come into possession of until I was twenty-one: but he has betrayed his trust—he has squandered everything that I had, and I shall never get anything," Violet explained.

"If that is so, he is a scamp," Sarah said, indignantly; "and if I was sure that your story is true, I'd give up my place and tell him to get somebody else to wait on you; I don't want to get mixed up in any criminal affair."

"Oh, no!" Violet cried, looking frightened, as the woman spoke of resigning her post to another; "if you won't let me go, pray stay with me; you at least are kind to me, and Wilhelm might get some one who would abuse me and whom I should be afraid of."

Sarah was touched with this tribute and Violet's evident liking for her.

"Well, I should hate to leave you, miss, I confess," she said, "for I've never seen any lady, in high life, before, who was so pleasant and sympathetic with poor folks; but I've given my word and I can't go back on it. I don't set up for a saint," she interposed, with a short, bitter laugh. "I'm far from being one, though since you've been here, I've begun to wish I could be a better woman. But I can't go back on my word; besides—a flush mounting to her brow—"he, Mr. Mencke has got a hook on my man, who ain't any better'n he ought to be, and he swears that he will clap him in jail if I turn traitor."

Violet saw that it would be useless to argue the question further with her, and that she not only would not aid her in any attempt to escape, but would resolutely defeat any effort on her part to get away; so nothing remained to her but to try to think of some strategem by which she might obtain her freedom.

The time hung very heavily on her hands, for she was too unhappy to take any interest in reading, though she was abundantly supplied with books and papers, and she found it very hard to be patient in her trouble.

She knew, of course, that Wilhelm Mencke could not always keep her a prisoner there; that when he should accomplish the purpose—whatever it might be—for which he had brought her there, he would doubtless let her know.

Still, it might be a long time, and she rebelled more and more against her disagreeable situation.

One thing distressed her exceedingly: she felt sure, and indeed Wilhelm had hinted that one of his projects was to get money out of Mr. Lawrence for her release, and she could not endure the thought of being employed as an instrument to "bleed" her kind friend—to use a bit of slang; but, though the early days were mostly spent in deep and perplexing thought, no feasible plan for escape had yet occurred to her.

One morning, nearly a fortnight after her capture, Wilhelm Mencke came into her room, while in his hand he held a large business-looking envelope.

She had not seen much of him thus far, for, as we know, she had frankly told him that she wanted him to keep away, for his presence was disagreeable to her.

She saw at once that he had come with some special object in view, and her curiosity was aroused to know what it might be.

"How do you find yourself, Violet?" he asked, helping himself to a chair, and regarding her searchingly.

"As well as I could expect to be under the circumstances, I suppose," she replied coldly. Then she demanded, spiritedly: "How long do you intend to keep me shut up like this, Wilhelm Mencke? I insist that you tell me. I cannot endure this suspense."

He laughed at her anger.

"You don't find it very agreeable to be caged, do you, my pretty one? And you are looking a trifle pale from the confinement. What a pity it is that you didn't marry your English earl; then you'd have escaped all this disagreeable experience," he sneered.

Violet did not reply to this taunt, and he resumed, in the same strain:

"I suppose you don't know that his lordship is visiting here just now? Perhaps you'd like to send him word of your uncomfortable predicament, and see if he would come to your rescue."

"Lord Cameron in New York!" Violet exclaimed.

"Yes; but the fact can't benefit you, and your chance of hooking him again, under any circumstances, would be very slim," Mr. Mencke retorted.

"You are very rude, Wilhelm," Violet replied, indignantly, though a flush dyed her cheeks at the coarse insinuation. "I have no desire to marry Lord Cameron or any one else; but I would be glad to undeceive him about that terrible accident at Mentone and let him know that I am still living. I know that he would be glad and would be my friend as of old, for he is a noble man through and through."

"Well, he has managed to console himself for your loss," Mr. Mencke returned, with some asperity, for it angered him to see how little she regretted the position she had forfeited, "for he is going to be married, and right soon, to a New York belle."

"Lord Cameron going to be married!" Violet repeated, surprise and interest in her tones. "To whom?"

"Nobody you know, I'll warrant," said her brother-in-law; "but she belongs to the upper crust of the city."

"But what is her name?" persisted Violet.

"Humphrey—Miss Agnes Humphrey."

"I do know her, and oh, I am so glad!" Violet returned, with a glowing face. "Wilhelm, this is the pleasantest thing you have told me in years. Miss Agnes Humphrey is one of the sweetest girls I have ever seen, and she will make a lovely Lady Cameron. I would give a great deal to be able to congratulate him upon having won her."

"Well, Violet, I must say you are the queerest girl I ever heard of," said her companion, gruffly. "Here you have let such a chance as that slip through your fingers, and now you seem delighted to have another woman walk into your shoes."

An expression of scorn curled the girl's lips. She was disgusted with the coarseness of this man, who could only think of position and pecuniary advantage in connection with marriage, without regard to love or honor. But she made him no answer; she knew that he could not appreciate her motives nor the refined sensitiveness that had made her shrink from marrying Lord Cameron for his wealth, when she had no love to give him.

"Well, all that is past and gone, and Cameron's doings are nothing to us now," the man went on, after a moment. "I came to see you this morning chiefly on business—I have a paper here that I want you to sign."

"You want me to sign a paper? Of what nature?" Violet demanded.

"That doesn't matter. I simply want your signature."

"But you cannot expect me to sign anything blindly," the young girl persisted. "I must know the nature of the document before I put my name to it."

"What has got into you?" Wilhelm Mencke exclaimed, with an oath; "you used to sign these papers readily enough when I wanted to dispose of property for you."

"True, for I believed in you then, Wilhelm. I had confidence in your integrity."

"And you haven't now, I suppose I am to infer from that," he sneered.

"No; how can I when you have so betrayed your trust? But what do you wish to dispose of now? I thought my real estate had all been sold, and that you had used up all money belonging to me," she replied, regarding him suspiciously.

"No; there's something more belonging to you yet, and I only want to turn it into ready money for you," he replied, but shifting uneasily under her searching look.

"Of what does this property consist?" Violet inquired.

"That doesn't matter. You are too young and inexperienced to understand business affairs. Just write your name on this line," he said, unfolding the paper in his hand, and pointing out the line, as he laid it before her, while he also passed her a stylographic pen, "and I will attend to everything else."

He had heard nothing in reply to his advertisements for his wife. They were still running in the papers, and he was doing everything he could think of to find her, for he knew she would be recognized as the nearest of kin to Violet, and it would be an easy matter for her to get possession of the fortune that had recently been left to the girl. But there was a possibility that he would not find Mrs. Mencke at all, and, in view of this he had armed himself with a document giving him the power of attorney for Violet, and the right to control her property until she reached her majority. With her signature to this, he would, as a last resort, reveal the fact that she was still living, secure the fortune for her, and while he could control it, feather his nest for the future.

Violet looked the paper carefully over, but it was so full of legal technicalities she could not half comprehend it; she only got a vague idea from it that Wilhelm wanted her to give him unlimited power to some property that still belonged to her.

She studied it a while, then dropped into a fit of musing, while he sat watching her, with an eager, cunning look.

She did not believe that there could be much of anything left, for he had once told her that every dollar of her money was gone, and it was a surprise to her to learn that he had overlooked anything—it might, perhaps, be an interest in some house or store, and perhaps she could make a bargain with him for it.

"If I sign this paper will you release me?" she asked at last.

He scowled. Evidently he had not expected such a request.

"Perhaps so. I'll think about it," he replied, evasively.

"Very well; when you have decided, you will please let me know," Violet quietly returned, as she pushed the document toward him.

"I want you to sign it now," he said, angrily.

"I will go with you at once to any lawyer's office, and sign it in his presence, with the understanding that I am free to return to Mr. Lawrence immediately after," Violet calmly answered.

"I suppose you think you are very shrewd in making such a proposition," sneered her companion, "but I am not going to accede to it, and you must sign that paper. I am still your legal guardian, but I cannot negotiate for you without your signature."

"I do not want you to negotiate for me, Wilhelm; if there is any property still belonging to me, it can rest as it is until I am of age to negotiate for myself; and as you refuse to let me go if I sign for you, I may as well try to save what little there is left of what my father willed me."

The young girl spoke composedly and decidedly, but she was terribly disappointed not to gain her point.

Wilhelm Mencke was furiously angry over her obstinacy. He coaxed, begged, and threatened; but all to no purpose—she resolutely refused to comply with his demand.

At last a sudden thought inspired her.

"How does it happen, Wilhelm, that it is necessary for me to sign this paper," she asked, "if everybody believes me to be dead? Why don't you claim this property for yourself, since you and Belle would naturally be my heirs? There is something in all this that I do not understand."

The man flushed hotly. He saw that she suspected double dealing on his part, and he would not, upon any account, have her learn of the fortune that had recently fallen to her.

"I can't find Belle," he said, sullenly, "and as long as she lives I cannot touch anything that belongs to you without your signature."

"Well, suppose you get my signature—people will then know that I am living, and you may have some awkward questions to answer as to my whereabouts," Violet suggested, while she watched him closely.

"That would not trouble me," he answered: "I simply want the right to handle this property for you."

"Was that the reason you brought me here?"

"It was one reason."

"What was another?"

"There is a reward of five thousand dollars offered for intelligence of you," he returned, with a cunning leer.

"Oh, Wilhelm! where is your honor—where is your manhood?" Violet cried, in great distress.

It was terrible to think of Mr. Lawrence becoming a victim to the rapacious cupidity of such a rogue.

"It is a shame to impose upon him in such a way—I will not have it—I will not bear it. Oh, you must let me go," she cried, greatly excited. "I will sign the paper—I will make over the property entirely to you if you will only release me."

"I cannot do that at present; when I decide upon a way to get that five thousand, without any risk of being arrested, you may hope to go back to the rich old codger," the man replied, and evidently enjoying her distress. "Meantime," he added, "you'd better be reasonable and do as I want you to."

"Never! I will never sign for you!" Violet exclaimed.

"Then you may have to stay here a good deal longer than you have any idea of. I'll keep you just to punish your obstinacy," her companion returned, with an angry oath. "Your signature may not be so important, after all," he added a moment later, "since if I can find Belle, or prove that she is dead, I can manage everything very nicely for myself."

He pocketed the document as he concluded, and then abruptly left the room.

Violet was much depressed by this interview, and burst into a flood of tears as soon as he was beyond hearing. It seemed as if there was no possible hope of release for her for a long time to come, while she was impressed that her degraded brother-in-law had some deep scheme for the ruin or robbery of someone in mind.

But she soon dried her tears, reasoning that she would only make herself ill if she gave way thus to grief, and arose to find a book to distract her thoughts.

Two farmers met on a narrow country road. Deep snow covered the ground, making turning out a difficult and risky job. One farmer yelled out in a bass voice:

"Say, if you don't turn out I'll do for you what I did for that other fellow."

The other quickly turned out. When past he said: "What did you do to the other fellow?"

"Why, I turned out for him."

A negro was burning grass by the roadside when a young fellow approached him, saying:

"Hey, Sambo, are you burning that grass so it will be as black as you are?"

"No, sah," said Sambo, "I'm burning it to keep it from getting as green as you are."

Editors have their troubles, too. One of them is bemoaning the loss of two subscribers. One wrote asking how to raise his twins safely, while the other wanted to know how to rid his orchard of grasshoppers. The answers were sent by mail but by accident the editor put them in the wrong envelopes, so that the man with the twins received the answer: "Cover them carefully with straw and set fire to it, and then the little pests, after jumping into the flames for a few minutes, will be speedily settled." And the man with the grasshoppers was told to "Give them castor oil and rub their gums with a bone."

A patron in a restaurant ordered honey. Noticing some hairs in the dish, he called the waiter to remove it and bring a dish of ice cream. Indignantly he summoned the waiter again. There was a hair in the ice cream! "Bring me a dish of apple sauce," he ordered, glaring at the waiter. Dipping his spoon in he found another hair. Thoroughly enraged, he called for the manager.

"I ordered honey," he complained, "and it was full of hairs."

"Quite so," gurgled the manager. "It easily happens. Doubtless it came from the comb."

"Oh!" said the astonished customer. "Well, perhaps you can explain why there were hairs in the ice cream?" he questioned sarcastically.

"Certainly," answered the manager. "You see, we shaved the ice this morning. Nothing unusual at all, sir, about a stray hair getting in."

"Is that so," bellowed the man. "I want you to know that even the apple sauce had hairs in it. What can you say to that?"

The manager scratched his head and finally chuckled, "Well say, stranger, you've got me there. I don't know how that could have happened. Them apples was all Baldwins."

SOMEWHERE IN VERMONT.

TO MY DEAR SISTERS AND COUSINS:

After reading the table of figures in a recent issue of COMFORT regarding the Home Fund for our dear Uncle Charlie, I was never so surprised in my life. For the last three years I have been travelling and got out of touch with COMFORT so learned no more of the movement until I returned home and again picked up a copy of "our paper." When the fund was first started I subscribed to it and honestly believed that every blessed one of COMFORT's readers would do likewise. I had supposed all this time that Uncle Charlie was already established in that "home." But when I found out he was still in the same old place and I got a glimpse of these figures,—well, I was actually flabbergasted!! Only $2,958.79 from 5,272 people in three years! What is the matter with human beings? The "tots" of Boston, not long ago (in a few months' time) raised over $6,000 for an Elephant Fund and yet the readers of COMFORT, both young and old, could not (I should say would not) raise money enough, in three years' time, to put dear Uncle Charlie into a comfortable home of his very own.

Don't you think we all ought to be ashamed of ourselves? Surely, in these days of easy money, and high extravagance, every blessed one of COMFORT's million subscribers could give at least 25 cents. And think what it would mean to Uncle Charlie! Even a dime from every one of you would have gotten the home long ago.

Do you know that a certain New England newspaper, last Christmas, raised (through its readers) over $20,000 for toys for the poor children of their city? And they did it in less than eight weeks, too.

The big COMFORT family has had over three solid years in which to buy Uncle Charlie a home and—he hasn't got it yet. Shame, on every blooming one of us, I say! I'll take my share of the guilt; although I did subscribe once, but once isn't enough. So right here I'll deposit a greenback—keep your thumb on it, Uncle Charlie.

Now my dear sisters and cousins, listen to me! You all declare your love for "our Uncle" but facts and figures prove that you "draw near unto him with your lips, but your hearts are far from him." Most of you are living in comfortable, cozy homes, therefore you cannot understand the awful monotony and discomfort of living in a city apartment house. I've lived in New York so I know what it is like.

Sisters and cousins mine, after you read this letter

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

THE skill and ingenuity of the cook is taxed to the utmost during the in-between season when the winter store of vegetables has become exhausted and the new vegetables are not on the market or else are prohibitive as to price. It is then she has to resort to new ways of serving ordinary foods and dishes suggestive of the season do much to relieve the monotony. The children will delight in anything that suggests April Fool's Day and the grown-ups are not above enjoying a dessert that is dainty and Easterlike in appearance.—Ed.

CREAMED CODFISH AND POTATOES.—Soak two cups of codfish over night. Drain and pick into small pieces. Add two cups of cold boiled potatoes, cut into small squares, season well, and add enough milk to cover. Cook slowly half an hour.

FOOLS' CAPS.—Peel and soak white potatoes in cold salted water one hour. Boil until they can be pierced through with a fork, but not overdone. Mash, add salt, pepper, half a cup of grated cheese to six medium-sized potatoes, and two tablespoons of butter. Stir together while potato is hot, and then add enough hot top milk to handle. Shape into caps, brush over with beaten egg and put into a quick oven until thoroughly hot and the outside has a glazed appearance. Decorate the crown with a rim of parsley or other green.

MACARONI AND MEAT HASH.—Boil one quarter of a pound of macaroni in boiling salted water. Drain, and line a buttered baking dish with it, sprinkling a little grated cheese over it. Fill center with any cold meat, chopped fine and seasoned well. Add a little milk and put in oven until thoroughly heated.—MRS. PETERS, Oshkosh, Wis.

BAKED MEAT.—Four pounds round steak, chopped fine; eight crackers, powdered fine; one cup of milk, three eggs, well beaten, one and one half teaspoons salt, one quarter teaspoon pepper. Mix well together, put in baking tin and bake two and one half hours.

POT ROAST BEEF.—Put a couple of slices of pork into a kettle and fry for a few minutes. Remove and add a piece of lean beef, seasoned well and sprinkled over with flour. Brown the meat on all sides, then add three cups of boiling water. Cover tightly and cook slowly until meat is tender, turning from time to time and adding water as needed. Thicken the gravy and serve on meat.

HAM CROQUETTES.—This is a good way to use left-over ham. Make a sauce of three tablespoons melted butter, five tablespoons flour, one cup of milk, salt and pepper to taste, a few drops of onion extract if desired, and one teaspoon lemon juice. Melt the butter, add flour, beat until smooth and add milk and cook until thick. Stir in two and one half cups finely chopped ham, let cool, shape, dip in beaten egg and roll in bread-crumbs. Fry in deep fat until brown.—MRS. M. L. T., Wyoming.

VEAL CHEESE.—Take equal parts of cooked tongue and veal and chop fine or put through meat chopper. Add a little cracker-crumb and moisten the whole with a little hot water. Season with mustard, pepper and salt. Press closely into a buttered mould, cover and steam one hour. Serve cold on a bed of lettuce leaves. Slice thin.

ESCALLOPED MEAT.—Chop leftover meat and to one pint of meat add one teaspoon chopped parsley, one half teaspoon salt, one teaspoon bread-crumbs and two tablespoons melted butter. Season to taste. Butter baking dish and cover bottom with layer of bread- or cracker-crumbs, over this spread meat with a few thin slices of onion over top. Cover with layer of crumbs, dot with pieces of butter and moisten with one half cup milk. Bake twenty minutes in hot oven.

OYSTERS AND MACARONI.—Line a shallow pudding dish with fine bread-crumbs, add a layer of macaroni that has been thoroughly cooked, a little salt and pepper and butter and next a thick layer of oysters. Continue this until the dish is nearly full, then sprinkle thick with bread-crumbs, dot the top with bits of butter and brown in a quick oven.

BAKED MEAT WITH POTATO.—Cut leftover meat in small pieces, season with butter, pepper and salt and add a little water. Put in baking dish and cover with mash potatoes, moistened with milk. Dot with pieces of butter and bake half an hour.

CORN-MEAL MUSH AND PEACHES.—Put four cups of skim milk into a double boiler. When boiling hot, add one cup of corn meal, mixed with a little cold milk, to the hot milk with one and one half teaspoons of salt. Stir frequently until it thickens and then cook three hours.

CORN-MEAL MUSH AND PEACHES.

As corn meal varies in the amount it will swell, it may be necessary to add a little more hot milk before it is done. Heap onto a serving dish, and over it pour peach sauce made from dried fruit. Serve with thin cream.

PRUNE SOUFFLE.—One cup of prunes, one cup of sugar and the whites of three eggs. Cook prunes until tender, drain and chop fine. Add sugar and mix well. Beat the eggs until very stiff, add prunes and bake half an hour in a moderate oven.

FILLED COOKIES.—Two cups of rolled oats, three cups of flour, one teaspoon salt, two cups sugar, one cup of shortening, one cup of sour milk, with one teaspoon of soda dissolved in the milk. Cream the sugar and shortening, mix flour, oatmeal and salt and add milk. Mix stiff and roll very thin. Cut with cooky cutter and on each one put a teaspoon of prunes and raisins cooked together. Cover with another cooky and press edges together.—MRS. H., Milton, Mass.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nicholas Berdyne, past middle age, his face marred by dissipation, schemes with Hartley Trenwyck to win Beryl Grayson, whose father is dead. She is engaged to Neil Preston, who goes to Alaska in the interest of a mine owned by Grayson and which falls into Berdyne's hands. Neil Preston is reported dead by Dave Gorsline, who is hired by Berdyne to tell Beryl. In her sorrow and loss of wealth, she refuses continued aid from Berdyne. Mr. Jackman from Denver, wanting to repay a debt owed to Beryl's father, invites Beryl to his ranch, where she forms a friendship for Tonita, a beautiful Mexican girl, who advises her not to marry Berdyne through any mistaken idea of gratitude. Irma Lee, discarded by Berdyne, warns Beryl that he serves his own selfish purpose and that Neil Preston lives and is on his way to Jackman's Ranch. Berdyne, persistent that Beryl shall become his wife, Neil Preston, overhearing her denunciation of his baseness and treachery and refusing to marry him, confronts Berdyne who swears he will follow his trail. The day Beryl Grayson becomes Berdyne's wife, Morley Preston, opposed to Neil's marriage, will tender Trenwyck a check for five thousand dollars and Berdyne will give a like sum. He admits Beryl's trust in Jackson and that the letter written offering her the home was inspired by him, that he holds a heavy mortgage on the Jackman ranch, and with this knowledge they plot to separate the lovers who plan to be married the following day. Jackman, a tool in Berdyne's and Trenwyck's hands, drugs the wine which he gives Beryl when he drinks with her to her happiness, and she, feeling dizzy and faint, goes to her room and the door is locked. Neil Preston, returning for Beryl, meets Tonita. Approaching Jackman's house, an automobile is in waiting and a man with Beryl in his arms appears from the house and lifts her into the car. Preston strikes him down, and taking the auto, with Tonita, they make their escape through the night for San Francisco. Trenwyck advises Berdyne not to go too far. Not to be foiled in capturing Beryl, they take an early train to San Francisco, wiring Goraline to watch for the auto, the Red Flyer, which he locates near the residence of a minister, who is called early to perform a marriage ceremony, which is scarcely over, when there is a summons from the door. Berdyne enters, and Neil, struggling to defend his wife, reels and falls to the floor mid the chaos of an earthquake, while Beryl is borne helplessly away. Making her escape, she wanders back to Pine Street, searching the wrecked house in vain for her husband, who is hurried to a temporary hospital by Tonita. She leaves a note for Neil that Berdyne has taken Beryl in the Red Flyer. Neil, regaining consciousness, goes in search of his wife, and seeing the wreck of the machine, knows that Beryl has escaped from Berdyne. Trenwyck, in league with Gorsline, meeting Beryl, assures her that Tonita is waiting for her on Sutter Street, and, unconscious of treachery, she goes with Trenwyck, where she is made a prisoner by Gorsline. Neil, wandering on Portsmouth Square, recognizes Trenwyck and following him sees him enter the house to which Beryl is persuaded to go. He opens the front door and lets himself in. Following the sound of voices, Neil sees Trenwyck and Gorsline and overhears the talk that a woman is made a prisoner. Positive that it is Beryl, he demands to know where she is, and with the refusal to tell there is a hand-to-hand struggle, in which Neil overpowers Gorsline, who admits she is in the library. Neil, entering, finds it vacant. Again in the street, he is pushed into a group crowded around a van piled with trunks, one of which is Berdyne's. The toppling of a brick wall breaks the trunk open and among the scattered papers is a charred bundle marked "Papers Concerning the Grayson Affair," and knowing their value, he hastens to the home of his cousin Arthur Preston of Nob Hill, where they can be safely guarded.

CHAPTER XXI.

ON NOB HILL.

"MRS. Preston! My poor child, where have you been during all this sad, sad time?"

A familiar voice struck on Beryl's ear. She and Irma Lee were making their way through the cool, sweet grass on the slope of Russian Hill, winding in and out among the pitiful structures of sheets and blankets which housed the homeless ones who had fled to the hill for refuge. Some one stood at the entrance of one of these rude shelters and cried aloud in a tone resonant with surprise and joy.

"Mr. Bickerdyke!" exclaimed Beryl, and in another moment she had fallen like a tired child into the good man's arms.

"Thank Heaven," said the minister, "that your steps were directed here! I have thought much of you, little one, and cried out upon the hard fate that snatched you from us. But you are alive and well, after passing the day in our stricken city, and there is nothing but gratitude in my heart. And I have something for you," said he, disengaging himself from the weeping girl and drawing a paper from his pocket. "Your marriage certificate," he finished, "witnessed by my daughter and your friend Tonita."

Beryl took the paper in her hands and pressed it to her lips. How thoughtful of the good man, amid all the harassing trials of the day, to think of that! Yet how many fond hopes and dear desires were wrapped up in that bit of paper. This certificate had come to take the place of her ring, cruelly torn from her hand by the wicked Gorsline.

Irma stood by with satisfaction flaming in her stern eyes.

"You are the minister who married Miss Grayson and Mr. Preston?" she whispered.

"Yes," he answered, surveying the woman with some curiosity. "Are you the little bride's friend?"

"I have befriended her," was the response, "and was taking her for safety to people I know who are encamped on the hill."

"You may leave her with me," said the minister. "I will care for her as I would for my own flesh and blood. Indeed, I have known her husband for years, and think the world of him."

"Her husband lives?" queried Irma.

"Yes."

Irma's satisfaction deepened.

"I am going down into the city," said she, "to search for one whom I must find. If I perchance discover Mr. Preston, I will send him here."

"Mr. Preston was taken to a temporary hospital in the Mechanics' Pavilion," observed the minister.

"The pavilion is burned!" murmured Irma quickly. "Was Mr. Preston badly injured?"

"I have learned from Miss Morales, who was with him, that the doctor said he was merely stunned."

"It would be well, I think," said Irma, "for you to persuade Miss Grayson to seek her husband at his cousin's, on Nob Hill. Her pride stands in the way, but perhaps you can overcome it."

Without another word, Irma Lee glided away and lost herself to view among the wretched shelters erected by the fugitives. When Beryl, who was dreaming over the bit of paper placed in her hands by the minister, turned to present Irma, she was gone. However, other thoughts, inspired by the certificate, were swirling in Beryl's bewildered brain.

"Tonita—she could not have signed this in your home, sir?" Beryl asked.

"She signed it at noon, when she came to our encampment after a fruitless, heart-breaking search for you," answered the minister.

"Then she knows where you are?" cried Beryl, a flicker of joy crossing her wan, sad face.

"She knows, my child, and she will come again. She is tireless in her attempts to find you. The girl has a noble spirit, a fine, unselfish nature. She loves you dearly, little one, and feared much on your account."

Beryl clasped her hands.

"Tonita is like a dear sister to me," she murmured. Then, with a frightened, startled glance, she said falteringly: "And—and Neil—my husband?"

Mr. Bickerdyke saw the agony of doubt, the heartbreaking anxiety, mirrored in the lovely face, and echoed the trembling words.

"Courage," he smiled, seizing one of her hands in a fatherly clasp. "Your friend and I, after the first paralysis resulting from your abduction had passed, carried Neil out of the house. A wagon was passing, carrying wounded people to a temporary hospital. Neil was sent in the wagon, Tonita going with him. The last thing I called to Tonita was that she would find my daughter and me on this hill. Tonita came back to us, and said Neil had merely been stunned by the blow he had received and that he would not be long in the hospital.

"Oh, where is this hospital?" cried Beryl, overwrought with joy and relief. "I must go to my darling! I must be with him in the hour he needs me!"

"You cannot go to the hospital, little one, for it has been burned. But," he added, noting the sudden woe that flashed out in the sweet face, "Neil could not have been there at the time. He is seeking you, and perhaps—we must not put too much trust in circumstances, you know—perhaps Tonita will find him and lead him to you. But come, let us sit here on the grass while you tell me all that has befallen you. Not one in the whole city but has met with sorrowing adventures this day. My daughter, even now, is ministering to the injured and distressed; and I," he added sadly, "may be called at any moment, as I have been most of the day, to give comfort to the dying."

Russian Hill is the most lofty height within the city proper, some eight blocks west of Kearney Street, and the same distance from the north shore of the peninsula on which the city is situated. There, while they watched the smoke hovering over the city's heart, Beryl repeated her story.

"Cruel fate," muttered the minister, "that this tender form should be so buffeted about in the swirl and strife of such a mighty disaster. Yet you are but one among thousands, my child. You encountered much evil, yet you also met kindness and generosity. Neil had relatives in the city," he went on, suddenly changing the theme of his remarks, "among them a wealthy cousin living on Nob Hill. You knew this, did you not?"

"Yes," she answered, averting her face.

"And Neil knew that you knew it?"

"He told me of his cousin himself," she answered.

"Do you not think that he would imagine that this cousin's house would be the very place you would go to seek him?" asked the good man gently.

"No, Mr. Bickerdyke," said Beryl. "Neil has told me things concerning his cousin, Arthur Preston, which would not allow him to imagine such a thing."

"The minister was no stranger to the enmity of the Prestons toward Beryl. Neil had made the minister his confidant.

"Today, my child," said Mr. Bickerdyke, "pride has been brought to her knees in this great city. There are no rich, no poor, no aristocrats, no plebians. The millionaire and the beggar share their last cup of water, their last loaf of bread. It would be well, I think, if you called at the mansion of Neil's cousin and asked for news."

"If you counsel it——" murmured Beryl, with trembling lips.

"I do counsel it. When you are rested and refreshed from such poor food as we have here, I will go with you."

She clasped his hand in silent gratitude. While they were eating some of the homely fare which the minister set out on the grass, fate, seemingly bent upon retrieving the hardships showered upon Beryl during the preceding part of the day, brought Tonita.

How can one do justice to the joy which filled the two friends as they leaped into each other's arms? Tonita was wearied to exhaustion with her fruitless search, and her glad tears mingled with Beryl's in the transport of this unexpected meeting. The minister could not remain long with the girls, being called away to attend upon the last moments of one who had been stricken down and had not been able to find the means for reaching a hospital.

With hands clasped and tired hearts reviving under the spell of tender companionship, the two friends sat long together, each recounting her varied experiences. Tonita, after learning that Neil was not seriously injured, had written the hurried note for him and had gone abroad into the city to search for Beryl. She had not much hope, knowing too well the evil daring and resourcefulness of Berdyne. Far and wide and into many dangers her search had led her, but she had come safely, although with an unsuccessful errand, through them all.

After hearing Beryl's story, the Mexicana was quite positive that Berdyne had succumbed when he had run the Red Flyer into the live wire.

"If he has met his death in this shattered city," breathed Tonita, "it is well. Many a better man has been killed or ruined this day, dear." The Mexicana shuddered. "Oh," she whispered, "I have seen such sights as I hope I may never live to see again! And they are being enacted over and over again, down there, at this very moment." Tonita waved one of her small, brown hands toward the fiery distance.

Evening had come while the friends were sitting and talking—a perfect evening. The air was warm, the clear, pale stars shone in the blue arch, and the hush of nature was broken only by the sullen roar to the south and by the low voices of those who had clustered on the hill. The smoke of the fire arose a mile or more straight up into the air, a great shaft luminous with the flame that laved its base.

Beryl felt and believed that somewhere under that awesome pall her dear husband, with the bitterness of despair filling his heart, was seeking for her. Her bosom trembled under spell of the thought. Suppose he had gone to his cousin's at Nob Hill? And suppose her own false pride had prevented a glad reunion with him? She arose suddenly.

"Dearest," she said, in quivering tones, "I must go to Nob Hill."

"What?" cried the Mexicana, amazed. "You will go there now?"

"Yes," and she told her friend why. "Mr. Bickerdyke has not returned," went on Beryl, "and I feel that I should not wait any longer."

"You do not know the way, querida," said Tonita.

"I can inquire."

"But suppose that wicked man, Berdyne——"

"Heaven may have decreed that he shall never trouble me more," answered Beryl simply. "Besides," she added, laying her hand on her heaving breast, "something here seems to tell me that I should go to Arthur Preston's—and go now."

"I will go with you then, dear," said Tonita, rising at her friend's side.

"But you are tired, Tonita!"

"I have not borne half what you have, Beryl. I could not let you go alone! Nothing shall separate us again while we are in this doomed city."

"My dear, dear friend!" murmured Beryl. "I hope that some day I may be able to repay you all your kindness to me."

They would have liked to inform the minister where they were going, yet Beryl felt sure that when he found them gone he would understand. Besides, it was he who had advised the step, and had humbled the foolish pride which had kept her from taking it before.

When they left the little refugee camp on the grassy slope it was eight o'clock—the very hour which saw Neil starting from Union Square for the same destination.

But the girls did not know the way so well as Neil did. Many times they strayed from their direct course, and many times they were wrongly directed. So it chanced that when they finally reached the mansion, and were assured by a man that it was the home of Arthur Preston, they had been an hour longer on the way than Neil had been. Almost overcome with weariness, they sank down on the broad steps to rest before ascending to the stately entrance.

Within the graystone enclosing wall of the mansion portable stoves were glowing, and tea was steeping in little Oriental kettles. These queer fires lighted the whole front of the house, in weird contrast with the immense banners of flame that shivered overhead in the night sky.

The palaces of Nob Hill seemed to have withstood the earthquake shock most valiantly; for the stately edifice, up whose marble steps Beryl and Tonita presently mounted, appeared to show no signs of ruin apart from its fallen chimneys and cracked and broken windows. As they stood on the great railed veranda and pressed the bell, someone inside stole a look at them through a broken pane.

The face of the person within was that of an elderly woman. It was a cold, haughty face, indelibly marked with that arrogance of caste which has gold for its god.

Both girls, their faces caught luridly in the light from the little stoves on the wall, were clearly under the eyes of the elderly woman. Astonishment crossed the woman's proud features—astonishment, which was swiftly merged into anger and apprehension. She turned to a man of thirty, or thereabouts, who was standing near her and holding a candle.

"A rare night for visitors, Aunt Hester," said he grimly, "and I must be my own flunky and answer the ring in person."

"Two girls!" gasped the woman. "Common people, Arthur. And one of them is—is——"

"Calm yourself, Aunt Hester," returned the man in his measured, well-bred tones. "What should excite you so? You know one of them? Who is it?"

"It is the working girl whose beauty has ensnared my son!" The words came quick and sharp, but in a low tone.

"Impossible!" muttered the man in a voice of dismay.

"I cannot be mistaken, Arthur!" the woman answered decidedly. "Oh, that this should happen, and now, of all times. I saw the creature once in Denver—in fact, I made it a point to see her—and I never forget a face. Send her away! Or, stay; can you keep Neil in his room while I talk with the girl?"

"I think so," returned the man.

"Then you might admit them and leave them alone with me."

The woman's thin lips closed with cruel firmness, and she waited ominously while Arthur Preston went to the door.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE LIE.

For the first time in long, long months, Neil Preston pushed his way through the refugees and mounted the marble steps to his cousin's stately home on Nob Hill. Never since Arthur Preston had sided with his mother and brother against Beryl had Neil the heart to cross his threshold. He turned to his cousin now as a last resort—willing, if Arthur was so minded, to let the dead past bury its dead.

An overmastering weariness was slowly but steadily creeping upon Neil's dauntless spirit. His strong limbs trembled under a strain that threatened momentarily to snap his endurance. He fought heroically against the weakness. But that which caused him the most dismay was the throbbing pain that darted from his wound.

Arthur himself, punctiliously clinging to his evening apparel despite the wreck and confusion that shook the city, came to the door bearing a lighted candle. Arthur's wife and children had gone, some days before, to the country house at Tamalpais, and the servants had fled like frightened sheep at the first great shock.

Neil's clothes were torn, dusty, and burned in places by dropping sparks; he was bareheaded, and his face begrimmed with dust; his cheeks were haggard, his eyes bloodshot, and the bandage about his temples gave him a gruesome look. Small wonder his cousin did not know him at first.

"Well, my man!" asked Arthur Preston impatiently. "If you have come here for relief you have come to the wrong place. You should apply to one of the relief stations operated by the Red Cross."

He would have closed the door, but Neil staggered through it before he could do so.

"Arthur!" exclaimed Neil. "Don't you know me?"

"Merciful heavens!"

Arthur Preston drew back and stared as though he could scarcely believe his eyes.

"Neil!" he exclaimed. "Why, cousin, what has happened to you?"

A cry of sharp surprise echoed from a near apartment. It was followed by a rustle of silk.

SOLVING THE BETWEEN-SEASON DAILY FOOD PROBLEM

—o—

By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

WITH the stock of canned meats, vegetables, jams and jellies run low, we are facing the usual spring problem of trying to serve well-balanced meals from such foods as are obtainable from house or nearby sources, which, when given a full measure of appreciation, will be found very abundant.

Eggs, fowl, apples and oranges are excellent foods for this season of the year, and many a delicious conserve and marmalade can be made from the dried fruits, citrus fruits and nuts. To be sure, it takes more time and care to cook fowl than it did the tender chickens last fall and early winter, but many prefer the full-flavored meat, though the texture is less fine. The apples, too, will require varied ways of baking to bring back flavor lost in storage, but with a small addition of other fruits, a change of appetizing dishes is obtained.

Eggs are in a class by themselves, and constitute one of our most precious foods. By the very simple use of water-glass, eggs may be preserved in the season of plenty and thus a store provided to draw from when they are scarce and costly. Considering the high food value of eggs, they are never so expensive as meat, and it is poor economy not to freely use them as a meat substitute on days when meat is unattainable. Eggs contain protein, sulphur, iron, phosphorus, lime, magnesia, fat and vitamines. Containing no starch, they should be eaten either with bread, rice, potatoes or cereals.

Below will be found various between-season recipes.

Malt Sugar Syrup—Our New Sweet

Of great interest to housewives is this new sweet which has appeared on the market, say the specialists of the Bureau of Chemistry, U. S. Department of Agriculture, who have investigated various substitutes for sugar.

While malt sugar has long been known to chemists the two factors that have stimulated its production on a commercial scale are the shortage of sugar and the recent institution of nation-wide prohibition of liquor, which latter has resulted in the diversion of many of the breweries from making beer and ale to the manufacture of malt sugar syrup. This syrup is made from the same grains as beer and may be made from corn, potatoes or any vegetable product containing starch. Barley, which heretofore was so largely used by the breweries in the manufacture of malt liquors, is now being utilized by these industrial plants for the production of malt sugar syrup.

Breweries, with very little change of equipment, can be used and are now being used for its manufacture. Up to a certain point the process is the same as in beer making. Evaporating pans are the principal additional equipment required by breweries to become malt sugar syrup factories.

Malt sugar syrup has a high food value, a delicious flavor, and looks very much like maple syrup. While for use on the table it may not be quite so convenient as sugar, for many purposes it serves as a cane sugar substitute. For cooking and candy making it is not only equal to sugar in convenience and food value but is superior in some respects because it will not so readily crystallize or "sugar."

It is predicted that malt sugar syrup will come into general use as the housewives learn about this new sweet and ask their grocers for it, who in turn will be glad to carry it in stock when they learn that there is a demand for it.

Cooking Fowl

All poultry should be dressed as soon as killed, as otherwise it is rendered unfit to eat, and may be actually infected with poison. On no account should broth for the sick be made from chicken or fowl not known to be freshly killed or drawn.

If the fowl is very fat and is to be boiled, it is best to skin it, boil the skin separately, and use the fat as a butter substitute. The water can be added to the chicken stock. Cut the wings off close to the body; also the thigh. Cut the legs from the thigh. Cut off the neck, and open the fowl the entire length along one side of the backbone. This exposes the heart, liver and gizzard; also the intestines which must be carefully removed and at once put into the garbage can. Cut the gall bladder from the liver without breaking. Remove the kidneys and lungs from the ribs and dispose of these and of the gall bladder as garbage. Too much care cannot be taken in dressing a fowl.

Pack the cut-up fowl closely in a stewpan and not quite cover with boiling water. Bring to a boil, and then set back where it will just simmer until done, adding salt one half hour before the cooking is finished.

FRICASSEED FOWL.—In a frying pan put chicken fat, butter or butter substitute. When very hot put in the cooked fowl and turn it frequently until lightly browned. Do not dry it. Remove fowl, put the liquor in which it was cooked into the pan. Boil a few minutes and then thicken with a little flour stirred smooth in cold water. Cook five minutes, season with salt and pepper. Return fowl to gravy and when all is hot it is ready to serve.

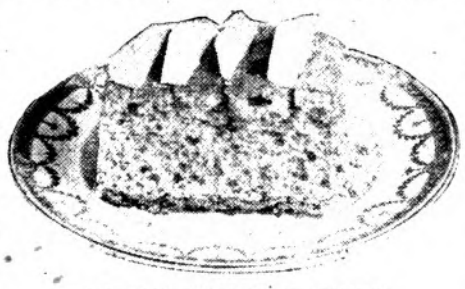
Substantial Egg Dishes

Cut three slices of bacon into small bits and fry crisp. Push to one side of pan and in the fat brown one cup of bread cut in small squares. Have ready six eggs with six scant tablespoons of fresh milk, one half teaspoon of salt and a large pinch of pepper. Pour this mixture onto the bacon and bread and rapidly stir from bottom of pan until the eggs are soft done. Serve at once with baked potatoes.

BAKED EGGS.—Grease muffin tins, and into each put a thin layer of fine bread-crumbs, a generous sprinkling of grated cheese, a bit of butter and a little salt and pepper. Put into oven and brown. Into each tin break one egg, return to oven and cook soft. Before the eggs are put into tins it may be necessary to grease them the second time.

BROWN-BREAD AND EGGS.—Fry inch-thick slices of brown-bread in beef or bacon drippings. Put them onto a biscuit tin, and on each break an egg and cook soft in oven.

FRIED EGGS.—Drop eggs separately into a saucer and then into hot fat. Set where they will slowly cook to a jelly-like consistency without the edges browning.



Various Ways of Cooking Old Apples

TUTTI-FRUTTI APPLES.—Make a syrup of one and a quarter cups of sugar and two cups of water. Pare, core and quarter six tart apples and simmer in the syrup until tender. Make a second syrup from half a cup of sugar and two thirds cup of water. Add the juice of half a lemon, two tablespoons each of seedless raisins and walnut meats, two slices of pineapple finely shredded, and two tablespoons of caramelled sugar. Simmer until thick. Arrange the cooked apple in a shallow serving dish, spread over it the fruit mixture and over it all pour the syrup in which the apples were cooked. Bake twenty minutes. Serve cold with whipped cream.

MARSHMALLOW APPLES.—Core medium-sized apples. Press into the cavity of each one marshmallow, cover with two tablespoons of sugar, a sprinkling of cinnamon and a small piece of butter. Keep sufficient water in the bottom of pan so that a little syrup will be formed while baking. The oven should be quite hot. When done, put a marshmallow on top of each apple, and as soon as they melt and brown remove from oven.

SCALLOPED APPLE AND BANANA.—Pare and slice apples, and slice bananas; use twice as much apple as banana. In an earthen baking dish put a layer of apple and a layer of banana. Squeeze a little lemon juice over it, sprinkled well with sugar, and dot with butter. Repeat until all the fruit is used. Add a little water; not too much. Cover tightly and bake one hour. Remove cover and brown.

FRIED APPLES.—Core and slice without paring. Put three tablespoonfuls of tried-out salt pork fat into the frying pan and when hot put in the sliced apple. Add about one dessertspoon each of molasses and sugar and about half a cup of boiling water. Cover closely and cook until done. Uncover and cook rapidly away any juice that may be left in the frying pan.

VEAL LOAF WITH FRIED HOMINY.

Other Recipes

EASTER CAKES.—Cream together two thirds cup of sugar and two tablespoons of butter until fine and light. Add one well-beaten egg and a little grated lemon rind and beat again. Sift with one full cup of flour, half a teaspoon of soda and one teaspoon of cream of tartar, and add it alternately with one half cup of milk. Beat hard and bake in round tins in a moderately hot oven.

FROSTING.—Stir one scant cup of powdered sugar into the white of one egg and one teaspoon of lemon juice. When thoroughly incorporated, beat with an eggbeater five minutes. Now add two tablespoons of dried cocoanut which has been previously soaked in a little fresh milk. Frost cakes, and if an Easter decoration is desired, on each cake perch a yellow Easter chicken.

ORANGE CHARLOTTE.—Pare and slice orange just thick enough to hold together; remove seeds and center and line a pudding dish with slices. Have ready a gelatine made as follows: Soak one third box of gelatine in one third cup of cold water twenty minutes. Add one half cup of boiling water and one cup of sugar and when dissolved add the juice of one lemon and one cup of orange juice. Strain, and when partly set, beat hard with an eggbeater. Add the well-beaten whites of two eggs and beat again. Pour into the dish lined with orange and set to harden. Garnish with dots of beaten egg-white sweetened and flavored with grated orange juice and nut meats.

VEAL LOAF WITH FRIED HOMINY.—Two cups of veal and quarter of a cup of fat salt pork put through the meat grinder. Add three quarters of a cup of crumbs, a little chopped onion, two beaten eggs and moisten with milk. Season with salt and pepper. Put lightly into a deep bread tin, cover with a second tin and set in a pan with a little water in it. Bake in a slow oven. Fry strips of cold boiled hominy and serve with loaf.

ORANGE CHARLOTTE.

OATMEAL COOKIES.—Cream one cup of butter or butter substitute with one rounding cup of sugar until very light. Dissolve one teaspoon of soda and salt in three tablespoons of boiling water and add cold water enough to make half a cup, and then mix with the butter and sugar. Have ready three cups of rolled oats mixed with three cups of flour. Add part to the mixture and when smooth add remainder. This makes a dry dough but do not add any moisture. Shape a little dough with the hands and roll thin. Press seedless raisins into each cookie and bake in a hot oven.

In Place of the Winter Jellies

Toward spring there is quite likely to be a dearth in the jellies and marmalades which we made last summer and fall, so I am going to give some easy-to-follow recipes to be made from dried fruits, nuts, etc.

PINEAPPLE AND PEACH JAM.—Soak one pound of dried peaches about two hours in cold water, then rub off the skins. Cover with cold water and soak over night. In the morning cut up the peach, add two cups of grated canned pineapple, and three cups of sugar. Cook until it thickens which will take about three quarters of an hour.

RAISIN MARMALADE.—Cover one pound of dried apricots with cold water and soak until the skins can be removed. Cover with fresh cold water and soak over night. Cover one pound of seedless raisins with boiling water. Let stand five minutes and skim out. Put through second water to rinse and skim out. Never pour off the water as it leaves the grit and dirt on the fruit. Put raisins and apricots together, add two cups of sugar and simmer until it thickens.

DRIED FRUIT AND NUT CONSERVE.—Cover one cup each of dates and figs with boiling water; skim out, rinse, remove skin and stones from dates, and cut both the dates and figs into small pieces. The cutting makes a better consistency than putting fruit through a food chopper. Wash one cup of seedless raisins. Wash and soak two cups each of prunes and apricots over night. Squeeze the juice from one lemon and two oranges and grate the rind from each. Cut in small pieces one cup of walnut or pecan meats. Put all the fruit together, add two even teaspoons of cinnamon, quarter of a teaspoon of cloves, and two cups of sugar. Let stand about five hours. Cook slowly one hour, add the nut meats and cook ten minutes longer. If not quite acid enough, add quarter of a cup of good vinegar. Be sure none of the nuts are rancid.

PRUNE TARTLETS.—Line gem pan with pastry. Make a filling as follows: Cream together four tablespoons of butter and two tablespoons of sugar. Beat in two well-beaten eggs. Add half a cup of fine bread-crumbs that have been soaked in half a cup of milk, one scant teaspoon of baking powder, half a teaspoon of lemon extract, and one cup of cooked prunes minced fine. Mix thoroughly and fill the pastry-lined tins. Bake in a quick oven until the pastry is done. When cold, top with beaten white of egg beaten again with honey to sweeten.

intoxicating. It was a wholesome, harmless beer of excellent quality, but had no alcoholic taste or odor and no intoxicating effect. But its manufacture and sale has been stopped by the recent act of Congress previously referred to. Ten or a dozen years ago the Maine legislature lost its balance under the influence of a bunch of fanatics and passed a bill prohibiting all beverages containing more than one per cent. of alcohol, but it never went into effect, for a referendum was promptly invoked and the people vetoed it at the polls by a large majority. Now don't turn against national prohibition, for it is doing too much good, but use your influence with your Congressmen to get the one-half of one per cent. limit repealed.

Cubby Bear at Foxy Reynard's Party

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CUBBY Bear stretched himself sleepily in his little bed, then opened his eyes. He had a curious feeling of not quite knowing where he was—of not quite knowing even who he was. He was just waking from his long winter sleep.

Slowly he got out of bed and went into the next room, where he heard Mamma Bruin moving about.

"It is spring, Cubby Bear!" Mamma Bruin said. "The beautiful spring has come! Grandma Bear has not wakened yet, so we must be quiet. I have some breakfast all ready for you."

After eating a large breakfast, for he was very hungry, Cubby Bear opened the door and went out to look about. The sun was shining brightly from a clear sky, the snow was nearly gone, the ground soft and moist, and a balmy little spring breeze blew down and kissed his face. He was filling his lungs with the pure, warm air, breathing deeply when Foxy Reynard came up to where he stood.

"Good morning," said Foxy, "and a happy springtime to you! I hoped I should find you awake, for I came to invite you to a party at my place tomorrow forenoon. Morning parties are something new and fashionable, and I like always to be in style. Shinyblack Crow, Robbie Reddie, and others are back from the south, and those of us who stay at home through the winter have seen little of each other since last fall. So I thought it would be delightful for us all to come together for a springtime party."

"Beautiful!" said Cubby Bear. "I will be sure to come!"

Next morning the forest was full of little woods people, all going toward Foxy's den. There were happy greetings, and everyone rejoiced that the cold, dreary winter was over, and that the wonderful spring was filling the earth with sweetness and warmth once more.

When Cubby Bear reached Foxy's den, in company with Shinyblack Crow, Chirpy Chipmunk, and Racky Coon, most of the others were there, standing about in the warm sunshine.

Mr. Wise Owl, blinking in the brightness of the morning, was talking with Dr. Squilly Porcupine; Tillie Turtle wore a brand new bonnet with purple strings and a yellow feather, and the Little Badgers were running the length of a small log which lay by the open door, and screaming with laughter when one fell off.

"Well, well!" said Wollie Woodchuck. "Here is Cubby Bear, out once more! Tell us, Cubby, if you have dreamed about your friend, Commodore Crane, in your winter's sleep?"

"I have not," answered Cubby, "nor any of the other cranes; but I mean to try and find them again, some day!"

Foxy Reynard was moving about among his guests, all smiles and politeness.

"Come in, come in!" he urged. "There are so many of us," said Busy Beaver, "we would more than fill your den, Foxy Reynard. Why cannot we stay outside? It seems a pity to lose any of this warm sunshine!"

"My house may not be as good as some," said Foxy meekly, "and I know it is not large, but I should not feel right when I have invited you all here for a party, if any were left outside. Come in, all together, now, and then a little later—perhaps—you can all play games outside."

Of course they could not refuse, and all crowded in.

Foxy stood by the open door, to usher them in, bowing and smiling and saying a pleasant word to each. Then, when Bunny Rabbit, who was the last to enter, was inside, quite suddenly Foxy stepped out, shut the heavy door with a bang and fastened it by bracing against it the small log on which the Little Badgers had been playing.

It was all done so suddenly, no one had time to interfere.

Helpless, they stood there, crowded together, all in the dark, for Foxy's den had no windows.

"What does he mean by it?" asked Wise Owl, indignantly.

"Open the door, Foxy!" cried Bunny Rabbit. "It is so dark here—let us out!"

"Listen!" called Foxy, and all were quiet, to hear what he had to say. Then, in gentle tones, Foxy went on: "Good by, my dear, kind friends. I hope you will enjoy my springtime party. Make yourselves quite at home—do anything you please. I freely give you the liberty of my home. As for myself, much as I would enjoy your charming company, deeply as it grieves me to tear myself away from you, I have promised to visit my cousin, who lives around on the northern slope of the big mountain, and he is expecting me today, so I must go. I shall be gone two or three weeks. Feel no anxiety about me if I am away longer. I shall be quite safe. And now, let me ask you all one question before I leave—have any of you remembered that this is the first day of April?"

FOXY STOOD BY THE OPEN DOOR TO USHER THEM IN, BOWING AND SMILING.

A cry of indignation from the prisoners within drowned Foxy's laugh.

"April Fooled! Oh, that bad, wicked, sly Foxy!"

"We must get out, somehow!"

"We shall smother—we shall die of hunger and thirst!"

"Oh, my Baby Bunnies! my poor, poor Bunny Babies!" cried Bunny Rabbit, putting his arms around the seven of them.

The tiniest Little Badger set up a shrill wail, and then followed a great sobbing, moaning and shrieking from the poor little trapped creatures of the forest.

"Well, well!" said Brother Binney Beaver, raising his voice, to be heard above the clamor. "This will never do. We must try some way of getting out. No use to hurt ourselves battering against the door; Foxy has seen to it that the log is firmly braced, you may be sure. Who has a plan for getting free?"

"We can dig!" piped up a small voice, and they found that little Chirpy Chipmunk was already at work, his small paws making the dirt fly rapidly.

"To be sure, most of you can dig!" said Wise Owl. "I would not be much help at that, but my part will be in advising the rest. Foxy has a strong wall of stone around the front of his den, but farther back, there is earth. Dig on an upward slant, for the den is hollowed out from a hillside, and digging on a level would only take you farther into the hill. It will take a long time, but there are some famous diggers among you, and you can take turns—one force resting while another works."

"No, no, no!" chattered little Chirpy. "Pay no attention to him, if you want to get out today! Help me dig in the place I have started, here under Foxy's door."

"Yes, he is right. That will be the quickest way out," said Busy Beaver. "Let me take your place at the work, Chirpy, for I am larger and stronger than you."

"Dig fast—dig fast!" implored Betty Badger. "I am fainting for want of fresh air!"

The work went on vigorously, and it was not long before Cubby Bear, who was taking his turn at digging, cried joyously, "I see light! We've got a tiny hole through!" and went on digging harder than ever.

"You don't need to throw the dirt in my mouth!" spluttered Wollie Woodchuck, whose jaws had been stretched wide in a great yawn.

Minnie Mink and Busy Beaver dragged the fainting Betty Badger to the little opening.

"Stand back, Cubby Bear, and give her air!" they ordered.

Soon the opening was large enough for Chirpy Chipmunk to crawl through, and after him trailed Slimy Snail.

"I wish I could pull away the log," Chirpy called, "but it is far too heavy for me."

Before long, some of the larger animals were out.

"Now, then, help with this log," said Brother Binney Beaver. "Take hold, here! Heave it away!"

Cubby Bear waited eagerly while the log was moved and the door thrown open. He and Wise Owl were the last ones in the den.

"Oh, come, Mr. Wise Owl!" said Cubby. "Come out into the beautiful sunshine and the sweet, spring air!"

But Wise Owl did not follow. Instead, he stalked gloomily into the farther end of Foxy's den.

"None of you would have my advice," he said sulkily, "and now you shall not have my company."

"Oh, come!" urged Robbie Reddie. "That dark den is no place to stay when the springtime breezes are blowing!"

"I can stay here if I like, I suppose?" was Wise Owl's answer.

"Leave him alone," advised Mollie Muskrat. "He will feel better by and by. It is a mercy we have escaped from prison, but it seems too bad not to have the party we expected."

"We must not let Foxy Reynard's cruel joke spoil the whole day for us," said Tillie Turtle, who had no mind to go back home alone, where there was no one to admire her new spring bonnet. "It is not much past noon, and now that we are all together, we can surely have a party somewhere besides in that dark den."

"Good, good!" cried her hearers.

"I know a fine place to play, where the snow is all gone," Shinyblack Crow told them. "I will show you the way."

Tillie Turtle and Slimy Snail were given a place in the Bunny Babies' cart, so they would not be left behind.

They all had a happy afternoon. Of course there was much to say to each other, after being separated so long; they tried some new games, and Robbie Reddie told wonderful stories of the tropical land where he had spent the winter.

God is the author and men are but the players; all grand pieces which are produced upon the earth have been composed in heaven.

The true law of the race is progression and development; whenever civilization pauses in the march of conquest it is overthrown by barbarism.

We sleep, but the loom of life never stops; and the pattern which was weaving when the sun went down, is weaving when it comes up tomorrow.

We have but one life here on earth; we must make that beautiful. To do this health and elasticity of mind are needful, and whatever endangers or impedes these must be avoided.

When a friend is angry with his friend, and wishes for a reconciliation, let him meet him face to face, and fix his eyes on his friend's eyes, remembering only the object for which he is come and forgetting all former grievances.

While a man is stringing a harp he tries the strings; when it is finished it is played for melodies. So God fashions the human heart for future joy, and only sounds a string here and there to see how the work progresses.

The man who has daily inured himself to the habits of concentrated attention, energetic volition, and self-denial in unnecessary things, will stand like a tower when everything rocks around him, and when his softer fellow-mortals are winnowed like chaff in the blast.

DRESDEN, N. DAK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

You know that England was the cause of the big world war. She got all the other nations in and when she seen she was going to be licked the U. S. was ready to plunge in and save her hide. Why did the Germans sink the Lusitania because it was loaded with high explosives which is against the law. You know very well Americans had no business to sail on a ship that was loaded with high explosives. Why didn't they sail on a passenger ship as they should have done, then the Germans would never have harmed them. It was a dirty, secret trick to get ammunition to the Allies. A person might as well say the U. S. was leading in the war against Germany right from the beginning when they shipped ammunition to the Allies. Why did not the U. S. help Germany too or else stay neutral as she claimed to do. I am an American born in America, but I don't think it hurts to tell the truth. VIOLET ———.
